and knees through the chapparal, for nearly two hours, I heard a distant sound like the falling of water. I immediately turned in the direction from which the sound came, and in about twenty minutes more, during which I was continually descending into a canyon, I came to a large mountain stream. I looked up it and the scene was very picturesque. It came roaring and dashing on for some distance above me, between two bold and rugged walls of rock, leaping from crag to crag in a succession of beautiful cascades, keeping continually wet with their glittering spray the leaves of the bushes that overhung them. My heart bounded sympathetically with the glad rush of the free waters, and with a heart elated with hope, I followed the course of the stream, knowing full well that it must lead me to the valley. I began to suspect that this must be the arroyo that irrigated Doctor Den's estate; and the same from which I had foolishly wandered the previous morning.

It was very hot weather, and as I walked along in the stream, supporting myself on the slippery rocks by means of a pole, I felt very much refreshed. I frequently drank of the water and toward noon I stopped and took a delightful bath. I here caught a little turtle which I killed and found eggs in it. These I ate, and relished them exceedingly. I kept the meat, thinking that perhaps I might want it. At length I came to a little clear place on the bank of the stream, and observed a narrow trail leading out of the brush wood down to the water. I at first thought that this trail was made by cattle coming to the water to drink. In this I was mistaken, as there are no cattle in those mountains.

It was toward sun down and I stopped here to rest for the night. I soon discovered what had made the trail. Hearing a rustling in the bushes I looked up, and, on the other side of the stream, I saw a beautiful deer. It was looking at me, and occasionally it would stand up on its hind legs, and then paw the earth with its little flinty hoof like an impatient racer. I was not thirty yards from it, and it remained in the same spot nearly twenty minutes. I had seen plenty of deer before in my wanderings, for that section of the State abounds in them, but they had always fled at the sight of me. This one had probably never seen a human being before. It seemed to pity me. Its intelligent bright eye seemed to say to me that it knew from my wretched and weary appearance that I had neither the heart nor the power to harm it. I would not have harmed a hair of its body for the world. It was a comfort to me to look into its face and fancy that I could there read sympathy for my distress; and when at length it turned lightly away and vanished in the bushes, I felt as though I had lost a companion. Shortly after my forest visitor had gone, I spread my blankets and stretching my weary limbs upon them I was soon wrapped in a deep sleep.

The next day, Friday, the first of August, I was awake betimes and continued my journey down the stream. I had not proceeded far before I became convinced that my conjecture as to this being the arroyo that ran through Dr. Den's farm, was correct. I saw the residence of my friend, and once more felt that I was restored to communication with my species. I did not go near the house, not knowing who might be about the premises, but crept stealthily down to the sea shore and gathered a quantity of mussels, which I put into my shirt, and carried back to the mountains. I also stopped and got over the fence into the Doctor's garden and pulled up some potatoes which I carried with me, thinking that I might by some chance get fire and cook them. In the hurry of my departure I had forgotten to ask Donna Rosa for some matches. On my return to the mountain I laid down my load by the side of the stream and prepared to make my breakfast. I had heard of the Indians making fire by rubbing two dry sticks together, and I tried the experiment. I labored at it about two hours but was at length obliged to give it up without succeeding. I afterwards learned from one of Dr. Den's servants how to do it, but it was at a time when I did not need the knowledge, and it availed me nothing. He had two sticks, one round and the other flat. In the end of the flat one a hole was bored exactly to fit the diameter of the round one. Into this hole he inserted one end of the round stick, and then rolled it back and forth between his hands until the friction produced fire. The sticks have to be of a peculiar kind of wood, which he pointed out to me. I tried the experiment and succeeded.

I contented myself with breakfasting upon the mussels raw, and enjoyed them pretty well. The tide not being far enough out when I visited the shore, I had not been able to gather many of them, and ate all that I had for breakfast. Toward the middle of the day, I again felt hungry, and resolved to try the raw turtle meat which I had put into the stream in my shirt to keep it fresh. I found, however, that it was too unpalatable. I was not quite hungry enough to get it down. Knowing, however, that if it once got into my stomach it would be nutritious and strengthening to me, I tried an experiment which succeeded. I peeled one of the potatoes, and then scraped it all away with my knife. These scrapings I mixed with water and made of them little balls into which I put small pieces of the meat, and thus swallowed it without any unpleasant taste. In this way I managed to eat a raw potato and the turtle.

I laid down supperless that night determined to get to the beach the next morning earlier, in order to be there at low tide when the mussels were more plenty. Accordingly, before it was quite light, I again started to the beach, and this time secured a bountiful supply. I returned, and after breakfasting heartily, had plenty of them left for dinner.

dread having to prepare an elaborate dinner because they are not sufficiently strong to stand over an intensely hot coal range. This is especially true in summer. Every woman takes pride in the table she sets, but often it is done at tremendous cost to her own vitality through the weakening effect of cooking on a coal range in a hot kitchen.

It is no longer necessary to wear yourself out preparing a fine dinner. Even in the heat of summer you can cook a large dinner without being worn out.

New Perfection
WICK BLUE FLAME
Oil Cook-stove

Gives no outside heat, no smell, no smoke. It will cook the biggest dinner without heating the kitchen or the cook. It is immediately lighted and immediately extinguished. It can be changed from a slow to a quick fire by turning a handle. There's no drudgery connected with it, no coal to carry, no wood to chop. You don't have to wait fifteen or twenty minutes till its fire gets going. Apply a light and it's ready. By simply turning the wick up or down you get a slow or an intense heat on the bottom of the pot, pan, kettle or oven, and nowhere else. It has a Cabinet Top with shelf for keeping plates and food hot, drop shelves for coffee, teapot or saucepan, and even a rack for towels. It saves time, worry, health and temper. It does all a woman needs and more than she expects. Made with 1, 2, and 3 burners; the 2 and 3-burner sizes can be had with or without Cabinet.

I remained in the mountains until the next morning, Sunday, the third of August, when I again descended to the seaside for my usual supply of mussels, and returned to eat them. I began to think now that it was almost time to hear something from my friends at Santa Barbara, unless my letter to Gen. Covarrubias had miscarried. Accordingly after my breakfast, I again descended and cautiously approached the Doctor's garden. Before I reached it I saw a man coming up the canyon leading a horse. He was a Californian, and one whom I had never seen before. I also heard the voice of some one singing. I immediately retraced my steps and concealed myself. I did not again venture to approach the Doctor's house in that direction, but remained most of the day in the mountains, making my way northward so as to come down into the road above the ranch, toward San Luis Obispo; thinking it much safer than to enter it between the Doctor's and Santa Barbara. After cautiously reconnoitering, I went over the point of a low hill just ahead of me, and stepped down into the road. I had not more than reached it before a Spaniard came directly upon me from the direction of the house, and appearing to know all about me, at once gave me to understand that Gen. Covarrubias was at the house, and desired me to come quickly. I went with him at once, and on reaching the garden, I was met by the Doctor, his wife, little Kate, Gen. Covarrubias, and eight or ten servants. The Doctor at once seizing me by the hand and exclaiming—"It is no time to talk," hurried me through the garden and into the house. Just as we entered it the Doctor pointed through an open window to five armed men who were riding along the road to Santa Barbara, coming apparently from the Arroyo Honde. "There they go," he exclaimed, "the rat catchers! They dare not search my house." I had a fair view of the miserable wretches as they galloped by, and as I looked after them I pitied them; yes, actually pitied them. For who can fall so low, and be so just an object of pity, as the human being who can pursue a fellow-man by whom he was never wronged, for hire?

The Doctor explained to me that he had returned from Santa Inez three days after I had left his house. That his wife had kept my note until his return, preferring to send it by his hand to Gen. Covarrubias. As soon as he had read it, he at once ordered his carriage, and taking his lady with him to avoid suspicion, proceeded to Santa Barbara and found the General. While there he discovered that a party under the lead of the White Pig, (Blake), was preparing to go to the Arroyo Honde with great hopes of taking me. They arrived, as he had learned, at the Arroyo on Saturday, the second of August. Besides Blake, the party consisted of a deputy sheriff who had a warrant for my arrest, a Scotch blacksmith and two others. They were all armed with guns and revolvers.

On arriving at the house, they asked the Senora a great many questions about me, but she, poor soul, who was now really ignorant of my whereabouts, told them she did not know where I had gone. Although she this time spoke the truth, they did not credit her, and forthwith searched the house, and old Konoya's hut, and then leaving at the house the bloody-minded son of Vulcan, with his great six shooter and double barrelled shot gun, to prevent the woman or her children from giving me warning, in case I was lurking about the premises, the other four beat the bushes about the mountains for some hours; meeting, however, with no success, they returned to the house, and the next morning, Sunday, returned disappointed and crest fallen to Santa Barbara. These were the five worthies whom Dr. Den pointed out to me from his house, as they were returning from their fruitless search.

General Covarrubias then entered and embraced me. He and his son Onisimo, and a few of Dr. Den's people had been searching the mountains high and low with provisions for me, and would have given me up for dead, but that a California woman named Marie Jesus, who lived with her husband in the garden, had seen me go to the beach for mussels on Friday. He told me he had been roaming through the mountains, singing—"Covarrubias! Covarrubias! no instructions!" in order to attract my attention, and let me know who and where he was. I told him I had heard the singing, and explained to him that I did not recognize his words or his voice, and therefore did not reply. The Doctor brought out some fine English ale and I consumed three small bottles of it before I quenched my thirst. It was the first thing in the shape of stimulus I had tasted for many days, and after the fatigues I had lately gone through, it revived me wonderfully.

In the meanwhile Donna Rosa set her servants to work preparing me a nice chicken, and then invited me to come into the parlor and seat myself by her on the sofa. She kept gazing at me, wretched and forlorn as I was, and murmuring pauvre viejo, etc.

I felt that I must have cut but a sorry figure in my ragged clothes, and but for the heartfelt kindness with which I was treated, and which placed me quite at my ease, I should have felt very awkward at finding myself in such a condition in the presence of ladies.

After enjoying a fine supper, and passing a delightful evening with that good and deservedly happy family, about nine o'clock it was thought advisable for me to leave the house. Donna Rosa provided me with a pillow and some blankets, and then, accompanied by the General, the Doctor, and a few of his people, I entered a corn field adjacent to the house, and in the centre of it made my camp. This was destined to be my hiding place for six weeks. The Doctor gave directions to the woman Marie Jesus and her husband, who lived in the garden, to watch over me and provide me with food until further orders. He then gave me a double barrelled gun, and told me that in the morning he would go to town, and make arrangements to thwart if possible the getting up of any further expeditions against me, or at any rate get the earliest intimation of them from his friends. He cautioned me against letting any one see me but those who belonged to his own rancho, and assured me I need have no apprehensions as to their fidelity and discretion. He and the General then bid me good night and left me. When they had gone I laid down on my blankets and felt happy. I poured out my spirit in thankfulness to Heaven that I had, after wandering for thirty days through the wilds of Santa Barbara, unsheltered and unfriended save by strangers, whose good feeling to me had been rendered useless by treachery, at length found a haven of rest, and a protector and friend on whom I knew I could rely. I fell into a sound and untroubled sleep, for I knew that I was guarded by the honor of a hospitable gentleman.

When I awoke on the morning of the fourth of August the sun was some hours high. My frequent potations of the Doctor's ale on the previous evening, together with an unaccustomed sense of security, had made my sleep more than usually sound. I found one of the Doctor's servants, Santiago, the husband of Marie Jesus who lived in the garden, standing by me with a good breakfast and some hot coffee. He informed me as well as he could that Don Nicholas, as he called the Doctor, and General Covarrubias had started early for the city. I had a slight headache when I awoke, but a drop of good brandy before breakfast, and the hot coffee, made me all right. I found my place of refuge very comfortable. The corn was so tall that I was continually shaded from the sun except at mid-day, when I made myself an awning by fastening the corners of a sheet to four stout corn-stalks. I had cleared out a place sufficiently large to enable me to move about comfortably, and, all things considered, I was very snugly lodged.

On Sunday, Donna Rosa, accompanied by her sweet little children, paid me a visit, and inquired through little Kate, after my health and comfort. The Doctor did not accompany her, for when absent in the city of a Sunday, he never returned till evening, always waiting to attend church. I replied to the kind lady that I was very comfortable, and after a very agreeable visit she returned to the house. That evening, the Doctor returned, and came out to the corn-field to see me. I learned from him that the hunt after me appeared to be rather flagging. None of the San Francisco Vigilantes were in Santa Barbara, nor had he heard of their being in the vicinity. Jack Power had started off in as suspicious a manner as he could in company with an old Spaniard disguised as me, taking the road to Los Angeles, and had been hotly pursued by the dauntless and zealous Curtis and Gough, and eight or ten lunch-eaters. The Doctor brought me a two weeks' file of the San Francisco Herald, besides a number of other papers, and I was abundantly supplied with the news. I here learned of another surmise as to my whereabouts. They had doubtless come to the conclusion at San Francisco that I could not possibly be in the State and have escaped my indefatigable pursuers, and on looking round for some place to locate me, had lit upon my native city. I also had the pleasure of reading in the San Diego Herald of the twenty-sixth of July, the following flattering notice of my movements from the pen of my soi disant friend, J. Judson Ames, Esq., publisher of that sheet:

Gossip about Ned McGowan.—This notorious individual is probably by this time in the State of Sonora. He was seen at Cariso Creek, on the desert, in the early part of this week, by the Express rider from Camp Yuma, who conversed with him, and by whom Ned sent his respects to Major Harvey, telling him that Col. Baker had arrived thus far safe, if an opportunity should offer of forwarding the message. He stated that he was going to Sonora. The Expressman says that Ned had "a very poor horse, but some mighty good brandy!" If they know at Camp Yuma that he has been indicted in San Francisco, there is some chance that the ballot box stuffer may yet swing at the end of a hempen cord.

This fellow after penning the above, had the impudence to approach me in Sacramento, (since my unexpected return) and extend both of his hands, expressing his most heartfelt delight at seeing me once more safe and in good health. My reply to him on that occasion is not at all pertinent to this narrative, but I desire that he will call it to mind, and then be assured that it was mild and gentle in comparison with the sketch of his history, dating from the days of President Tyler to the present hour, which I have promised myself the pleasure of drawing at some future time.

Auto Notes

The Bay Cities Electric Company reports the sale of a four passenger Columbus Electric Victoria to Mr. Albert Frank of the well known firm of S. H. Frank & Co., leather merchants. The car is for the use of Mrs. Frank and the fact that she has already become an adept at driving after only one lesson is a tribute to the ease of operation and perfect control of this popular Electric. The Victoria body will be used during the summer in the country and will be replaced for use in the city during the coming fall and winter with a four passenger Brougham body which is interchangeable on the same chassis.

Announcement was made recently by Ivan L. deJongh, sales manager of the Standard Motor Car Company, to the effect that A. Meister & Sons of Sacramento have been appointed agents in that territory for the Kelly line of delivery wagons and trucks for which the Standard Motor Car Company are the Western representatives. A. Meister & Sons are one of the largest dealers in vehicles in the Sacramento Valley and through their selling force expect to dispose of a great many of the Kelly trucks this season. The first shipment of these vehicles for the Sacramento agents will arrive this week.

Ten thousand nine hundred miles on Diamond tires without a retread is the experience of Mr. F. T. Seripps of Pacific Beach, Cal., on his Buick "20." He writes The Diamond Rubber Co. that the tires look as though they would easily do 2000 more miles before it would be necessary to retread. "This service," he writes, "has been over the worst roads that any car could have traveled." Not only has he had exceptional mileage from Diamond tires on his Buick but he further writes that he is receiving from 8,000 to 10,000 miles from them on his Great Smith car and because of this service is a very ardent booster of Diamond quality.

J. Rose of the Howard Automobile Company has just returned from an extended trip up the Sacramento Valley. Rose took up a Buick "40" toy tonneau of which he made delivery in Dixon. According to his report, the auto business is very much on the boom in this section of the State. In Winters he declares over 130 automobiles are owned while practically every farmer of any consequence is driving a machine. The horse racing season was on in Woodland and Rose says that the town could hardly hold the automobiles in which the ranchers drove to town. Sacramento is selling several hundred per cent more cars this season than ever before. Abreast of the most popular of these machines is the Buick.

A new "Overland Scout" issued "ever now and then" by the Willys-Overland Company has just appeared. The "Scout" is not a catalogue by any means but a genuinely interesting automobile journal filled from cover to cover with just the kind of material for which the auto fan hankers. The articles are above all else readable and are written in a highly pleasing style. The illustrations too are made from the best cuts and are selected from photographs collected from all over the country. Among the more interesting stories are "The Racing Marion," "Autos versus Broncos," "What Makes the Car Go," "From Michigan to Florida" and "Can the Auto Aid My Business?"

H. M. Owens, president of the San Francisco Motor Club, is working for the success of the coming Tanforan Good Roads meet with admirable energy. Accompanied by George Detrick he left town recently to motor down to San Jose. The purpose of his trip was to interest the auto enthusiasts of the different towns en route in good roads generally, and especially in the big carnival of May 29 and 30. "We do not expect this trip to start anything new in good road sentiment," said Mr. Owens, "for various communications have convinced us that the people in this section are already strong for more extensive road improvement and support. The real reason for our going is to keep things moving as they are started, and by such advice and information as we can offer, to expedite matters as much as possible."

G. Scharlach with a party of friends recently made a trip in his White Gasoline Car to Los Gatos and Saratoga and return. They went down on the other side of the bay and came back by this, making a total of 146 miles on the tour. Mr. Scharlach reports that the roads are rapidly improving and touring conditions are almost ideal. The car ran in great form the whole way, consuming but eight gallons of gasoline.

The ability of the Chalmers to negotiate mountain roads and such as are not the best is well exemplified in a report just received from Dr. L. C. Gregory of Fort Bragg by the Pioneer Automobile Company. Dr. Gregory has one of the most extensive practices in that section of the State and his calls often take him into the neighboring lumbering and logging camps where the roads are exceptionally poor, most of them cut up by the heavy hauling to which they are subjected and others designed for little more than sledding purposes. The Doctor, however, makes all these trips in a Chalmers which throughout a year of service has been equal to all occasions. The up-keep expense during this whole period totals just $3.60.

The Haynes Auto Sales Company's entire force in San Francisco have found themselves exceedingly busy during the past week. Two additional men were required to unload and equip arriving cars so that deliveries could be made to owners as specified. Last week four carloads of Haynes machines went out on deliveries while two more carloads are now being unloaded, all of which are sold. The company has found it impossible to keep cars on hand even for demonstrating purposes and prospects have accordingly been looked after in machines borrowed from private owners.

The Babcock Electric Carriage Company has just issued a statement of the Babcock's recent achievements in Eastern hill-climbs and endurance contests that is rather surprising to those who are inclined to hold all electrics in contempt. There are at least a dozen of the famous hill-climbs listed in which this electric broke all marks set by gasoline cars of near its price and all but equalled the time of several of the big $4000 machines.

No lubricating oil has established its right to be called the racing car driver's choice so clearly as Monogram. A large majority of winners in all the big racing events are users of this oil. In the Fresno to Coalinga run Free who drove the Winton to such a remarkable victory was using this lubricant, as were the Buicks who won later events. A good majority of the other entries and winners were aided by Monogram.

S. G. Chapman has just unloaded a shipment of ten Hupmobiles which he is now equipping for delivery. This makes twenty of these cars received during the past four days all of which were sold before arrival. Twenty more Hupps are now en route from the East. These machines are a part of the additional allotment secured by Chapman during his recent Eastern trip.

The Buick truck is rapidly achieving a state wide reputation for its economic superiority as a commercial vehicle. Ed. R. Walbridge of Red Bluff, owner of the Tuscan Springs and Hotel, recently came to town and took delivery of one of these trucks which he drove back home. This vehicle, together with two more, for which he left orders with the Howard Company, is to be used in transferring merchandise between town and the springs.

Although not of age, Howard Bauer, the Buffalo boy who has been driving an Oakland "40" in several of the important hill-climbing events of the country has a record that might be envied by those twice his years. Young Bauer has the distinction of winning in every event in which his car has been entered. In some events he not only piloted his machine to victory in the class for which it was entered, but usually won the "free for all" events, defeating cars of great horsepower rating and selling for much more money.

The handsomest thing that has ever come to town in the way of a motor commercial vehicle is probably the Autocar truck, delivery of which has just been made to the Shasta Water Co. by Walter C. Morris. The bed of this vehicle is specially constructed, being composed of an upper and lower structure each containing compartments for 250 syphons. This gives the whole truck a 500 syphon carrying capacity. The truck is handsomely painted and lettered and is attracting no end of attention.

Something of the satisfaction that R. D. Chapin, president of the Hudson Motor Car Co. found in his Western trip is indicated by a letter written to the Hudson factory from California. It reads: "Perhaps the most pleasing feature of my trip has been the excellent reputation which the public have given the Hudson car because everywhere I go they say it is the best looking and the best built car for the money. This sort of reputation is very hard to get and harder still to keep, but one thing you can feel assured of, and that is that having secured this reputation we are going to spare no expense, brains or energy to maintain it. All motor cars on the coast get about fifty per cent more use in the year than in any other section of the country, consequently this reputation for service is harder to get out here, and it is intensely pleasing to find the Hudson car so well regarded."

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 29,498.

EVA M. MARTIN, Plaintiff, vs.
GUY C. MARTIN, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to GUY C. MARTIN, Defendant.

You are hereby directed to appear and answer the complaint in an action entitled as above brought against you in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, within ten days after the service on you of this Summons—if served within this City and County; or within thirty days if served elsewhere.

And you are hereby notified that unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any money or damages in the complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the complaint.

Given under my hand and the seal of the Superior Court at the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, this 10th day of May, A. D. 1910.

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 29,006.

ROSE P. BLOW, Plaintiff, vs.
CHARLES H. BLOW, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to Charles H. Blow, Defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant on the ground of defendant's wilful desertion of plaintiff continuously for more than one (1) year last past; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

Given under my hand and the seal of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 11th day of April, A. D. 1910.

SUMMONS TO ESTABLISH TITLE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—Action No. 20,653.

MARY E. NORMAN, Plaintiff, vs.
All Persons Claiming any Interest in, or Lien Upon, the Real Property Herein Described or any Part Thereof, Defendants.

The People of the State of California: To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of MARY E. NORMAN, plaintiff, filed with the clerk of the above entitled Court and City and County, within three months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

FIRST PARCEL.—Commencing at a point on the Southerly line of Twenty-fourth Street, distant thereon seventy-five (75) feet Easterly from the Easterly line of Sanchez Street, thence running Easterly and along said Southerly line of Twenty-fourth Street twenty-five (25) feet; thence at a right angle Southerly ninety (90) feet; thence at a right angle Westerly twenty-five (25) feet; thence at a right angle Northerly ninety (90) feet to the point of commencement. Being a portion of Horner's Addition Block No. 88.

SECOND PARCEL.—Commencing at the point of the intersection of the lines of the Southeast corner of Twenty-fourth and Vicksburg Streets, thence running along the South side of Twenty-fourth Street in an Easterly direction fifty (50) feet; thence at right angles in a Southerly direction parallel with Vicksburg Street ninety (90) feet; thence at right angles in a Westerly direction running parallel with Twenty-fourth Street fifty (50) feet; thence along Vicksburg Street Northerly ninety (90) feet to the point of commencement.

THIRD PARCEL.—Commencing at a point on the Easterly line of Vicksburg Street, distant thereon ninety (90) feet Southerly from the Southeast corner of Twenty-fourth and Vicksburg Streets, and running thence Southerly along the said Easterly line of Vicksburg Street Twenty-four (24) feet; thence at right angles Easterly and parallel with Twenty-fourth Street seventy-five (75) feet; thence at right angles Northerly and parallel with Vicksburg Street twenty-four (24) feet; and thence at right angles Westerly and parallel with Twenty-fourth Street seventy-five (75) feet to the Easterly line of Vicksburg Street and the point of commencement. Being a portion of Horner's Addition Block No. 88.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that the plaintiff is the owner of said property in fee simple absolute; that the title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consist of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiff recover her costs herein and have such other relief as may be meet in the premises.

Witness my hand and the seal of said Court this 17th day of March, A. D. 1910. H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.

A Book of Absorbing Interest

The pioneer times of the middle west, the Harrison-Van Buren campaign and the Mexican War itself are all so far in the back ground today that except to the student it makes little difference whether "Nathan Burke" is a biography or a bit of unconventional fiction. Either way it is both entertaining and instructive enough to hold the attention from the initial paragraph to the last word where the narrative is abruptly broken off. He was a man of the type we have elected to distinguish as "Lincolnian." Burke's parents died when he was so young that he was scarcely conscious of having had any. There being no public institutions for the care of waifs, Nathan Burke, like other babies in the same predicament, was taken into the household of a neighbor, poor but willing, and there he lived until his fifteenth year, taking his part in the farm labors with the Williams boys, going to school the few weeks when there was a school to attend and in the intervals hunting and fishing and absorbing a knowledge of woodcraft, until he secured a position as chore boy at the munificent compensation of twelve dollars a month in the "city" home of the Duceys. Jake Darnell who was Burke's preceptor in wood lore had been with Daniel Boone and deer were still to be found within a few hours of primitive travel from the "city." We have a vivid picture of the "Log cabin and hard cider campaign," and its catch phrase of "Tippecanoe and Tyler, too." We follow the career of Burke, promoted betimes from general utility about the Ducey home to clerk and head accountant in the store, spending his spare money for books and his spare time in the study of them, much to the annoyance of his mistress, still enchanted with the docility of the negro servants whom she had known before her marriage brought her north and still retaining her habit of discussing her white assistants in unrestrained tones, as if they were deaf or idiotic, to be tickled when she condescended to address them, and flattered when she rewarded them with tid-bits from the family table or cast off finery of her own. As Burke's star ascends that of the scion of the Ducey house sinks. It would be hard to say whether heredity or environment had the most to do with it in either case. George Ducey could look for nothing from his mother save effeminacy and good looks, nor was there more to be expected from the paternal strain. Burke on the other hand scarcely knew his parents' names, much less any thing else concerning them, and he had to rise or fall by his own efforts, there being no one else interested. Young Ducey would probably have been instructed in snobbishness by his amiable mother in any case, but it is evident that the much-boasted democracy of that pioneer settlement has been grossly exaggerated, for the line between the chore boy and the young "gentlemen" of the town was as sharply drawn as it is today, and Master George would have found himself more at home in a modern university than he evidently did in the primitive colleges which he attended as long as he could endure the lack of consideration shown him by professors and classmates. He did not cut a better figure in the war where he was provided with an officer's commission, than have the scions of more recent statesmen who have traded on their parental "pull." The story is artlessly put together, clear and simple in its style, yet lacking what we are pleased to call "literary finish," as would naturally be the case when such work is undertaken by a person unaccustomed to much writing for publication. The numerous letters which are introduced not only shed much light on the Ducey household and the town inhabitants but on the educational standards of that day. Mary S. watts, whose name appears on the title page, assures us that she has tampered as little as possible with the judge and general's own work, on the principle of old George Marsh's epigram, "You let a man talk for half an hour and he'll tell you what sort of a fellow he is," and she could not have selected a better plan. This is one of the books that one is apt to lay aside with a sigh of regret because there is not more rather than of relief that the end has come at last, but of course it all depends on "the one." From the Macmillan Company.

"The Rules of the Game"

Stewart Edward White is giving us a new view of the football hero in fiction. Hitherto the college-bred sport has had but to conquer. Coming and seeing have been superfluities on his part for it was a foregone conclusion that having played through four years under educational guidance he could not but sweep any world before him. Bobby Orde, who occupies the center of the stage in "The Rules of the Game," is the son of that John Orde who was "The Riverman," and a mighty good man, too. The elder Orde thinks there is no occupation to be mentioned in the same breath as lumbering. He is a very wealthy man, for readers will probably remember that early in his career he began to buy up western timber tracts to hold against that time when the eastern forests would have disappeared, but he has never told Bobby, nor for that matter any one else, the extent of his holdings. Now, the son having graduated from the football field with a post-graduate course as professional coacher, he is put in harness. John Orde does not wish him to have any advantages through birth and connection. He believes in letting every herring hang by its own gills, so Bobby is to make good on his own account and thus far he has not done it. Given a position in the Chicago office of a big firm he is found to be weak in simple arithmetic, inaccurate in copying statistics, and too little interested in his work to find out what the various figures and letters stand for. He isn't capable of filling a simple clerkship so is sent up to one of the mills to assist the bookkeeper and there again, the same thing happens. He sees in the country such a fine place for training—for sports, of course, and ere long he disgusts his superior who finds him making so many errors in keeping tally that he is given his time and a lad who has had not even high school training is called in from the yard to take his place. Orde had just about come to the conclusion that he was less capable than he had flattered himself but that by sticking to it, in time he would learn, when the shock came. He found out that in the business world, as distinguished from college, there is no time. Important transactions cannot be held up while college graduates learn to add columns of figures, write legibly and copy reports accurately while they forget the careless habits they have been diligently cultivating. Eventually Master Bobby will probably prove worth the salt that goes to season his food but up to the present his college education is not only so much time wasted but so much useless lumber to be discarded. On the whole he is a pretty nice boy but it is an open question yet in the minds of readers as well as in those of the lumber men, whether he is going to prove anything like as capable a man as his father was. The story, in its initial chapters, is a good bit truer to life than any of the presentments of the ex-footballer kicking the round world before him to any goal he desires.

Our Imaginative Astronomers

The eccentricities of Halley's comet, bringing as they did confusion and humiliation to many distinguished scientists, and tending to shake the faith of laymen in the dogmatism of the men profoundly versed in astronomic lore, are much to be deplored. It is evident that what the astronomers don't know about comets is almost as vast as what the hog has yet to learn about the precession of the equinoxes. This however is not so discreditable to the astronomers as some people imagine. The only just criticism to be made with respect to them is that they talked too much. To live up to the best traditions of science the scientist should refrain from exploiting his half-baked theories in yellow journals either for the delectation or the amazement of the mob. Science has been described to be "the statement of truth found out," and the supposition is that it is a combination of good sense and reason the highest reach of which is the recognition of human ignorance. Our astronomers have been letting their imagination run riot, speculating about what might happen, making undigested hypotheses the basis of startling speculations, and stimulating among the ignorant all the worst misgivings of superstitious awe. The more familiar we become with the mental processes of the men behind the twentieth century telescope the greater becomes our respect for the ancient students of nature who had no means of verifying the observations of the senses through experiment; the more we wonder how they could have succeeded as they did. At the same time, notwithstanding all the boasting of the great advance that has been made in astronomical research in modern times, we realize how little the world owes to students of the heavens since the night when Galileo expounded the principles of astronomy to the Doge of Venice on the tower of St. Mark's.

Perennial Graft

It must be discouraging to civic patriots to perceive that their efforts to extirpate dishonesty from public life are in vain. Rare is the day that passes without their learning of the discovery of some act of dishonesty on the part of a servant of the people. Notwithstanding all the spasms of morality that have seized the people in the principal cities of the country in recent years graft is still enriching the unscrupulous. Corruption in politics remains as one of the characteristics of the government established by our forefathers for the benefit of mankind. We are told by the prophets of civic regeneration that the prevalence of unscrupulosity in public office is due chiefly to the malign influence of the predatory interests that manipulate the machinery of politics. But we know that long before the "interests" became intrenched in the political field there was corruption in public office, and more of it than there is today. The White House itself was involved in scandal more than once in the days long antecedent to the accumulation of vast wealth in the hands of a few men. When conventions were collarless, long before the boss ruled with an iron rod, exposures of dishonesty were of periodical occurrence in State legislatures. In those days when the science of American politics was young the ramifications of big swindling schemes extended through the halls of Congress, and statesmen of exalted station were besmirched as a result of their greed. Experience teaches that venality is not the by-product of any system of politics; that it flourishes in many atmospheres and burgeons under a variety of conditions. It would be easy to show that there is less impurity in politics today than there was fifty years ago. If there appears to be more now it is because the civic conscience is more sensitive than formerly, and for the reason also that reformers have developed great faith in the efficacy of vociferation and denunciation. The corruption that is in public life is due rather to the laxity of morals in private life than to the methods by which our political affairs are conducted. The maxim that the people get the kind of government they deserve means among other things that the morals of public servants are no worse than the morals of their constituents.

Carnegie's Pet Hobby

Just before starting for Skibo last week Mr. Andrew Carnegie had a few words to say about universal peace from which we infer that he is laboring under the delusion that the idea is of recent growth and that the Hague Tribunal is a conception of the current generation. The fact is that for several centuries people have been talking about abolishing war. Before Mr. Carnegie was born associations were formed for the purpose of making peace perpetual. Kant wrote an essay on the subject, and there were philosophers in the early part of the last century who ridiculed the notion that human ingenuity could devise a scheme by which the rude trade of bloodshed could be abolished. It was even argued by learned Christians that war was a moral necessity involving benefits of compensation such as continually lurk in evils, a necessity because of opposite tendencies of a still more evil character. The poet Wordsworth entertained some such view of the matter as may be learned from his lines:

> "That God's most dreadful instrument,
> In working out a pure intent,
> Is man—arrayed for mutual slaughter;
> Yea, Carnage is his daughter."

As to the Hague Tribunal the principle of that institution was thought of by Thomas De Quincey, who, nevertheless, regarded the project to abolish war as "the most romantic of all romances." He declined to join one of the innumerable peace societies of his time, but he bequeathed half a crown to the chief association for extinguishing war, the half-crown to be held in trust until needed, by which time, in his opinion "it will have become a fund so large as to overshadow the earth." De Quincey believed in the moral necessity of war, but he predicted that the range of war would be prodigiously circumscribed by reason of the causes of war being diminished "by the force of opinion focally converged on the subject." He believed it possible to achieve this consummation by means of an Areopagus or central congress for all Christendom with the purpose of "healing local or momentary animosities and taking away the shadow of dishonor from the act of retiring from war." Thus did De Quincey adumbrate the Hague Tribunal.

Our Defenseless Coast

The launching of the fourth American Dreadnought, the Florida, reminds the New York Sun that there is not a single battleship on the Pacific Coast or in Asiatic waters. "That being the case," says the Sun, "would it not be well to give heed to the admonition of Brigadier-General Anderson, U. S. A., retired, that 'if it is the adopted policy of the Government to keep all our battleships on the Atlantic seaboard, then at least the bulk of the army should be kept on the Pacific Coast?'" This is a question that deeply concerns the people of this coast. It should inspire agitation. Its importance should be impressed on the representatives of this coast in Congress. Some time ago appeals were made to the Administration to increase the strength of the Pacific fleet, and we were told that it was considered very bad policy to make two comparatively weak fleets out of one strong fleet, and that we must wait till more battleships were added to the navy. It was argued that as there was more danger of an invasion on the Pacific than on the Atlantic Coast the strong fleet should be maintained on this side of the continent. The argument made no impression on the powers that be, and our representatives in Congress allowed the matter to drop into the limbo of forgotten things. Now comes General Anderson in the Pacific Monthly sounding the warning that if the American people are to feel secure from attack on the Pacific Coast they must resort to "obligatory training for manhood military service." He calls attention to the fact that our military land forces on this coast consist of only 10,000 regulars exclusive of the staff force. He says that only 40,000 regulars are available, outside of our dependencies, to repel invasion, and that military equipment is almost entirely lacking on the coast. He declares it idle to contend that the cruiser squadrons in Pacific waters could prevent the landing of a Japanese army convoyed by a great battleship fleet. The New York Sun thinks it proper to applaud General Anderson "for telling the American people that they fail in a patriotic duty to themselves when precautions are not taken to prepare for an invasion that may never come, but that might have ruinous consequences if it surprised them without arms in their hands." And the Sun thinks that his proposal that the greater part of the regular army in the continental United States be stationed on the Pacific slope is worthy of the General Staff's serious consideration. What do our own newspapers think about the matter? Do they, or will they, give it a thought? They are very busy at present discussing the Ballinger-Pinchot controversy, the latest moral issue and other live topics of burning interest, but perhaps they may find time to rouse a few statesmen who are now preoccupied with the mending of their political fences and to persuade them that it is their duty to heed General Anderson's suggestions.

Labor Problems

The following letter is so full of interesting information, so conducive to wholesome reflection that it is deemed worthy of prominence:

Editor Town Talk: I am glad there is one paper in San Francisco not afraid to tell of the evil effect the closed shop is having on San Francisco. As you have taken up this topic for discussion perhaps it will interest you to know that the Hammond Lumber Company and Swayne & Hoyt are having steel steamers built at Long Beach; also that Captain Higgins has gone to Eureka to have a steamer built. The closed shop is the reason this work is not being done in San Francisco. Many of the union men who lost their jobs in the Union Iron Works are now working ten hours at Long Beach and Los Angeles is getting the benefit. San Francisco is surely getting the worst of it. And our un-American labor unions are making conditions harder ever day. Do you know that lumber is being sent from this city to the Middle West to be manufactured into doors which are sent back and sold in this city? In the labor news published in the Chronicle of Thursday last you will find that the Plumbers, Gas and Steam Fitters' Union has finally decided that the reduction in the number of apprentices from one to each journeyman to one to five journeymen must continue, though it throws about two hundred helpers out of work. Do you know what this means? It means diminishing the opportunity for American boys to learn a trade. This is one of the worst evils of unionism. Boys are driven into the street to make room for journeymen, many of whom are aliens. Have you read the book printed by the Commonwealth Club for April containing a record of its transactions touching the subject of labor problems in California? If not get it and see what interesting flubdub aids the digestion of some of our leading citizens. Your comment on Mr. Weinstock is timely. I wonder if he would remain an ardent union man if the unions unionized his store. I wonder if Hale Brothers would be kow-towing to the unions if organized labor took an interest in the wages that girls are paid in those stores. This is a matter that you should look into. The principal argument in favor of the closed shop is that it prevents employers from cutting rates. That being the case the White House must be getting the worst of it in the dry-goods business. Mr. Raphael Weil, an honest merchant, pays high wages. He is in sympathy with his employes, but he isn't always parading his great humanitarian principles.

—Employer.

San Francisco, May 21st.

We have taken the advice of our correspondent and read the printed record of the discussion of labor problems before the Commonwealth Club by employers and members of labor unions. We find it a very interesting volume. All of the old familiar problems that men have been discussing for many years are therein presented with views on both sides of every abstract question that have been expressed thousands of times by partisan debaters of industrial issues. The arguments with one exception are time-worn and hackneyed. The one exception emanated from Mr. Russell Wisler, a union man, who holds that there is no such thing as the "public interest" in labor disputes. This proposition he conceives to be conclusively demonstrated by the circumstance that in all labor disputes organized labor affirms that its interest is identical with the public interest whereas capital affirms that public interest is its interest. Thus does this profound logician, who apparently was taken most seriously by the Commonwealth Club, arrive at the conclusion that public interest is a myth. Yet he talks about the paramountcy of that interest, and holds that to concede the paramountcy of what he denies to have any existence at all is "to abandon all hope of justice and to reduce the elements of the problem to the level of mere convenience." This is strange doctrine, and we are surprised that it went unrefuted among so many intelligent men as those that constitute the Commonwealth Club. The very name of the club ought to have acted as an inspiration on some of the members. To concur in Mr. Wisler's doctrine is to hold that the very fundamental principle of trades-unionism is not entitled to recognition. That principle is the principle of combination for the general good of working men. If there is such a thing as the general good of a class why is there not such a thing as the general good of society? And certainly society is not made up of the two classes—capital and organized labor. The theory of civilization is that society is like the human body, for the benefit of which all parts should be articulated, since if one goes wrong the rest suffers. To concede that there is no better rule for men than that each individual or each clan should strive for a selfish benefit without caring how such conduct will affect the widespread network of society is to hold that anarchy is superior to social order. Class interest destroyed every nation that has ceased to live except in history. Yet we hear class interest preached without protest to a body of men banded together for the benefit of the commonwealth.

The Duel

His eyes were bright, his teeth were set,
His arm looked lily-white and fair.
His weapon shone, as though 'twere wet
With liquid moonbeams. All his hair
Blew backward from his brow, the while
I stood and watched him with a smile

I think it was a kiss misplaced
Upon a cheek deemed his alone.
Or, 'twas another's favor graced
The bosom of a maid; I've grown
To think and do and then forget:
So, 'tis enough to say, "We met."

How frantic with unholy rage
He grew that night! I still can see Him, restless; like a lion's rage,
His foolish, boylike, bravery.
Ah well! he made one foolish thrust—
And I took Chance, as all men must.

I threw my rapier on the snow
And crossed to where the stripling lay,
His friends around; I stooping low
Drew near his lips. I heard him say,
"He wins who gets her love!" and then
He neither stirred nor spoke again.

'Twas from that hour my fortunes fell:—
God! even down to this, the last!—
For here I lie, and know full well,
The loaded dice of Death are cast.
Hush Father! listen! this is true;
The maid he loved died that night too!

It little mattered then to me,
That she was dead, I loved her not,
And little cared; 'twas strange that she Should share his grave. Perchance they rot Clasped cheek to cheek, as lovers might.
'Tis mine, to sleep alone to-night.

Alone, good Father! hark! I heard
A sound upon the window pane!
A little tap, as though a bird
Had fluttered there; Hush! there again!
I see a face all drawn and white!
I shall not sleep alone to-night.

God! it was cold the night we fought,
The night I grinned when he grew mad.
I mind me how his breath was short,
And what a reckless guard he had.
And she died, too, his promised bride!
From grief 'twas said. How things betide

Is very strange. Look, there he is!
You cannot see? Ah, well, I can!
He smiles, as though 'twere nought amiss,
That I lie here, a dying man.
If he would fight, then he knows well,
Our weapons must be crossed in Hell.

I played with lust, I toyed with gold,
I courted fools and little cared,
I deemed life something bought, or sold,
According as the vendor fared.
Look! he is there, all drawn and white,
He comes to watch my bed to-night.

Ned McGowan's Narrative

(This serial account of the adventures of a fugitive from the vengeance of the Vigilance Committee begins with the history of the circumstances that led to the organization of that so-called law and order body. McGowan has told us of his escape from San Francisco, of his flight to Santa Barbara and of the many romantic episodes that marked his career during the months he was in hiding. All the while the Vigilance Committee kept up a search for him, and he was assured of being hanged if captured. In the seventh instalment the reader accompanies him to the home of Dr. Nicholas A. Den where he was given protection.—Editor's Note)

(Eighth Instalment)

Early in September, I received a visit from my friend, the Hon. Pablo de la Guerra. It was the first time I had seen him since my arrival in the county, though I was by no means ignorant of his many good offices to me during my adversity. I was, as may be supposed, delighted to see him, and his visit, though short, was very agreeable. He was on his way to San Luis Obispo on some private business, and had taken the opportunity to call on me.

A few days after I was visited by the gallant and chivalric Capt. Thomas Moore. This gentleman is the son of a Post-Captain in the British Navy, and an Irishman by birth. He had adopted the sea for a profession, and he it was who secreted in his ship the Irish patriot D'Arcy McGee, when the British authorities were in pursuit of him, and brought him safely to America. He had been a great traveler, and the chances and changes of a sailor's life had thrown him in 1851 on the shores of California. He had married a young and beautiful California lady, and was located as a permanent citizen of Santa Barbara, on a rancho called "Sal si Puedes," about forty miles distant from the residence of Doctor Den. I was very much pleased at making his acquaintance, and found him a most worthy gentleman and agreeable companion. He had recently been to San Francisco, and informed me that one of the Executive Committee of Vigilance had declared in his hearing, that if they could but get me back there, they would spare my life just long enough to erect a gallows on which to hang me, and no longer. He informed me that himself and some friends had been endeavoring to procure a schooner, for him to command, and safely run me into some port in Mexico, but had failed in the enterprise. After a very long and agreeable visit he departed, having first cordially invited me to visit him at his house, which I promised to do as soon as it could be considered safe.

About the middle of September, Doctor Den started for San Francisco. His little daughter Kate had been for the past two years under the care of the Sisters of Notre Dame at San Jose, and it was now past the time when she should have returned to her studies. She had learned to speak and write English fluently and grammatically. Her Spanish too, I was told, was pure Castilian. She told me she disliked French, but I told her all young ladies ought to learn it, and without it she would not be accomplished. She promised me she would pay more attention to it the coming year. I sent several messages by the Doctor to certain friends in San Francisco, and wishing me comfort and safety while he was gone, he and his little daughter departed.

A few days after this, as things appeared pretty quiet, it occurred to me that I would avail myself of Captain Moore's invitation and visit him at his ranch. Accordingly, on the morning of the twentieth of September, I told Santiago that I intended to take a trip to Sal si Puedes, and asked him to accompany me as guide. He was delighted at the idea of a holiday, and saddling two of the finest horses on the place, he reported himself ready for journey. The Sal si Puedes is situated on a wagon road that runs from Santa Barbara to San Luis Obispo, through what is called the Gaviota Pass, avoiding the mountain of Santa Inez which is of course impassable for wagons. As we did not get off until late in the morning, we did not arrive at our destination until just before night-fall.

The road lay for the first twenty-three miles after leaving the Dos Pueblos, (Doctor Den's place) along the coast, passing Senor Ignatio Ortega's ranch, and the Arroyo Honde. It then suddenly turns into a very deep and narrow mountain gorge, running eastward from the coast. This is the Gaviota Pass—and a more wild and lonely spot one would not wish to see. It seemed as if formed by nature for purposes of ambuscade. After traversing this pass for about three miles and a half, we came suddenly to the Rancho of Las Cruces, the residence, it will be remembered, of my Spanish friend whom Power had deceived as to my destination when he took me to the Arroyo Honde. As may be supposed, I had no particular desire to see any one here, or to be seen. We therefore rode on without halting, seeing only one man on the road, a Californian, from whom we got some grapes. The country now became more open and level, and after riding about seven miles further we came to the Rancho of San Julian. This is one of the De la Guerra estates and is an extensive and valuable piece of property. About eight miles further brought us to Sal si Puedes, the residence of my friend Captain Moore. We had left the road shortly before getting there to take a near bridle path over the hills. As Santiago had not been there before for three years, he remembered this path but indistinctly, and the consequence was that it took us some time to find the place. At length, however, we stumbled directly upon it. Turning the foot of a low hill who should we see but the Captain, who on seeing us, welcomed us very cordially, and guided us to the house. I could not help telling the Captain that Sal si Puedes (get out if you can) was a good name for his place. I saw that he kept a store there, and told him that he reminded me of the fool in Philadelphia, who said if all the world were dead he would open a house on the "Ridge Road," not stopping to think where his customers were to come from. He told me to come into the house and tomorrow he would show me where his customers came from. I then entered with my kind host and he introduced me to his young bride. He had been married but three months. The Senora is a daughter of Captain James W. Burke, an Irish gentleman who has resided in Santa Barbara for thirty years, having married a California lady shortly after his arrival. The wife of the Captain, whose name is Madelina, speaks no English as yet, and is very pretty, lady-like and hospitable. I had by this time picked up enough Spanish to understand most that was said, and generally make myself understood, and though it was a little awkward, I managed with the aid of Captain Tom to get on in the conversation pretty well. I enjoyed an excellent supper at my friend's hospitable board, and after passing a very pleasant evening, we retired for the night. My friend seemed very apprehensive that I had come from my hiding place in the corn too soon, and lest any one should have observed me on the road, he placed me in the room adjoining his own, so that he could be on hand to assist in case of a demonstration against me. I enjoyed a sound sleep, however, without molestation of any kind, and in the morning took a delightful bath in a hot spring adjacent to the Captain's house. I then sat down to a pleasant breakfast, and was made to feel quite at home by my hospitable host and hostess.

UNION SQUARE SAN FRANCISCO

It being Sunday, we were visited by a great number of Californians and Indians who came to purchase all descriptions of goods at the store. Some of them had ridden fifteen and twenty miles out of their way to get the Captain's whiskey, which was a pure article and only fifty cents a bottle, while at the Mission of Santa Inez and other places of the sort, the article was miserable and the price a dollar. I told the Captain I wanted to purchase a dress for Marie Jesus, the wife of Santiago, whereupon he directed her husband to select one that pleased him, and then presented it to him. I could not induce him to let me pay him for it. In vain I expostulated, he only replied, "you have probably use for what money you have, another time you can pay me." And I had to submit.

I remained with my hospitable friend till the next day, (Monday), at four o'clock p. m. He would not permit me to start earlier lest some one of the people who had been at the store should have identified me, and, in order to secure the reward that had been offered for me, lie in wait at Las Cruces or in the Gaviota Pass, with the expectation of my passing in the day time.

All things being in readiness, the Captain gave us a bottle of his best whiskey, and particularly impressed Santiago with the necessity of great care and watchfulness in going through the Gaviota Pass. Santiago promised faithfully to obey his instructions, and bidding farewell to the good Captain and his lady, we started. My visit to the Sal si Puedes had gratified the Captain and been most agreeable to me. I felt as though I had another true friend in case of need, and I began to look upon myself as less of an outcast, and more nearly approaching every day my former position among my fellow creatures. Indeed the Captain had told me before I left him, that in case of any unforseen circumstance compelling me to leave my asylum at the good Doctor's, I must unhesitatingly make my way at once to him, and as long as he had life I should have protection.

Santiago and I rode on without anything of interest occurring till shortly after we had passed the San Julian Ranch, when we saw a couple of grizzlies playing on the side of a mountain not far from us. There were a great many cattle in the vicinity and they were running in every direction, frightened at the grim intruders on their domain. I felt alarmed and drew my pistol, anticipating an attack. Santiago, however, gave me to understand that there was no cause for apprehension, and the horses we were riding having often been used for lassoing these animals, cantered on without exhibiting any signs of fear. Santiago told me that at that particular ranch these beasts are very destructive of the stock, killing a cow or a bullock almost every night. The Californians hunt them with the lasso on horses trained for the purpose. Notwithstanding we rode at a brisk gait it was after night when we arrived in the neighborhood of Las Cruces. Here we dismounted and tightened our saddle girths. Santiago laid his ear to the ground and listened for the sound of horse-hoofs, but hearing none, we again mounted and rode silently past Las Cruces and through the Gaviota Pass without molestation. Having struck the coast, we rode the remaining twenty-three miles at a round gallop, and alighted at Dr. Den's at two o'clock in the morning. Of course no one was stirring about the premises, and betaking myself to the corn-field, I slept till day-light. The day after my return from Sal si Puedes, Donna Rosa told me that if I thought it perfectly safe, a room was at my disposal in the house, where I would be more comfortable than in the corn-field. All things taken into consideration I concluded that by this time I could safely accept the offer of my kind hostess, and accordingly a room was prepared for me, and I was from that time until my departure from Santa Barbara domiciled under the hospitable roof of the good Doctor.

I was now very comfortable, and almost began to forget my sorrows. One thing, however, I could not banish from my remembrance, and that was that an indictment for murder found by a Grand Jury of my countrymen was hanging over me. My original intention, as has

The Physician at the Supper Table---VI.

By the Sybarite

It was half an hour past midnight when the Doctor and his friend commenced discussing a Spanish omelet and a bottle of Rudesheimer, the latter having been purchased especially for the club.

"I noticed a few days ago, Doctor, that there had been several cases of bubonic plague at Glasgow, again, and an alleged case at Honolulu."

"If I were going to confine myself to a single wine during the rest of my life I would unhesitatingly choose Rudesheimer or Schlos-Johannisberger."

"You know, Doctor, I have never quite understood what this bubonic plague is."

"Yes, sir, I would choose either Rudesheimer or Schlos-Johannisberger. I staid several days near where these noble wines were made during my last run through Germany. On the Rhine, or on its tributary rivers, between Coblentz and Mayence, all the most celebrated wines of Germany are grown. The grape preferred for cultivation in this region is the Riesling, a small white, harsh species. The reputed characteristics of German wines are generosity, dryness, fine flavor, and endurance of age. It is averred that even the strongest are never saturated with brandy. The whole eastern bank of the Rhine to Lorich—a tract called the Rheingau, about fourteen miles in extent—has been famous for its wines for ages. Here is Schlos-Johannisberger, once nearly destroyed by Gen. Hoche. To Steinberger is assigned the next rank. Grafenberg is thought to produce wine equal to Rudesheimer, which is a wine of the first Rhine growths. Marcobrunner, Roth, and Konigsbach are highly esteemed, but Bacharach has lost its former celebrity. These are all white wines of the Rhine country. Its red wines are deemed inferior. Red Assmannshauser is pronounced the best. The most celebrated of Moselle wines is the Brauneberger, of which there are numerous varieties. One of these, known as Gruenhauser, used to be styled the nectar of the Moselle. In Wurtzberg is grown Steinwein, produced on a mountain so called, and named by the hospital to which it belongs, Wine of the Holy Ghost.

"The German wines, and also the Italian wines, are much truer than the French and the Spanish. Nearly all of the two latter that are sent to America have been adulterated. For this reason the Italian wine is infinitely the more wholesome beverage and ought to be more sought after. There is no doubt that greater care in its preparation would greatly improve its character, but the Italian peasant is obstinately conservative. He will go on using the same vats from year to year without ever thoroughly cleansing them, and will often mix all sorts of grapes together. The time during which the wine is let to ferment exercises also a great influence on its quality, and here again the peasant proprietor, with his small cellarage limits and his restricted capital, is at a disadvantage. He cannot afford to keep his wine long; he must turn it over and make it into cash. Of all Italian brands Chianti is most in request, and its superiority is due in a great measure to the quality of the grapes which grow on the spurs of the Apennines, where there is a great deal of sun and very little rain. It is not likely that the making of wine in the French sense will ever take root in Italy. The Italian has a great dread of what he calls vina malizato, or falsified wine; literally, wine that has been made malicious. Genuine wine he calls sincere.

"By the way, the most precious wine in the world is that contained in a cask named the Rose in the Bremen town hall cellars. It is Rudesheim Rhine wine from the year 1653, and the cask is replenished by degrees, whenever wine is drawn, with carefully washed and dried gravel. It is never sold, but destined exclusively for the sick of Bremen, who receive a very small quantity on production of a doctor's certificate. At present the supposed value of this unique wine has so increased that a bottle containing eight glasses would cost $1,600,000, a glassful nearly $200,000 and a drop $46.20."

"As I have often said, Doctor, you are a perfect encyclopedia on all such matters. I would like to have a few hundred drops of that wine to sell."

"I have given some thought to what has been termed the bubonic plague, and I find that it is the lineal descendant of that which was cleared away from London by the Great Fire. It represents one of the many epidemics which history teaches us devastated Europe during past ages;—pests, these, abolished by the disappearance of the dirt which forms their soil and breeding place. We know the germ of the plague. It was discovered by Kitasato in 1894, and independently in the same year by Yersin, whose protective serum is used as a preventive. The germ is a somewhat shortened and rounded bacillus, that flourishes at a temperature approaching that of the blood. Apparently the germ does not multiply by giving off spores or seedlike bodies, but by simple division of the parent germs into others. It is easily killed. A temperature of 212 degrees Fahrenheit destroys it quickly and acids also act efficiently in this direction. Yersin found the plague germ living in the soil in affected places. In the earth it appears to be nonvirulent, but placed in another environment, say the animal body, it speedily develops its disease-producing powers. Cows, sheep, pigs, cats, and, of course, rats, are affected by it, but the dog is said to enjoy an immunity from the attentions of this bacillus. Gaining access to the body, through the skin for the most part, and probably through some abrasion or wound, the bacilli make for the glands, and as these swell and enlarge, constituting what we doctors call buboes, the disease has become known as bubonic plague. The fleas which infest the rat are also credited with a share in the diffusion of the ailment, for, charged with the microbes, these parasites will infect other rats, or may possibly inoculate man. It may be added that in one form of the plague the lungs are liable to be specially involved, and the coughed-up matter in that case is highly infectious. So far, I do not believe we have had any real bubonic plague in California. But we should be on our guard against it; for, like smallpox, it comes like a thief at night.

"And that reminds me that, of all the plagues which have arisen from time to time, or infested cities or countries, none is more dreaded, none is more persistent, none is more easily communicable or fatal than was smallpox a century ago. But whence or how the disease arose it is not easy to say. Other plagues have vexed the earth for a time and then passed away, leaving no vestige of their ravages as did the great plague at Athens during the Peloponnesian war, or the plague in England of Charles II.; but smallpox, not content with twelve centuries of sway, still holds its own, despite the discoveries of science. It is unquestionably true that diseases of such contagious nature generally arise among filthy and ill-conditioned people confined in narrow quarters. This was the case with the Athenian plague, and it was again the case in the Jewish quarters of European cities. Contagious diseases were comparatively rare among the Romans and Greeks of the illustrious period, owing to the free public baths and excellent sanitary and gymnastic habits of the times. It was reserved for the middle or dark ages to furnish the most dreadful examples of pestilence. Smallpox arose in the very darkest period of mediaeval times. It first invaded England in the ninth century; it was common in Arabia in the tenth; the Crusades carried it through all Southern Europe; it reached Norway in the fourteenth century; in 1517 it was carried to St. Domingo by the Spaniards along with slavery, the Inquisition, the rack and a host of other infamies; three years later it crossed to Mexico and slew three millions; it invaded Iceland in 1707, and Greenland in 1733, slaying a fourth part of the residents in the former and a large proportion of those in the latter country, and despite all that medical skill has done and is doing to cast it from the earth, it bids fair to retain its hold, in some measure, as long as population, ignorance, destitution, negligence and carelessness continue to combat the physicians and the dictates of common sense. Its history is thus unique; other contagious diseases have proved as fatal under similar circumstances for limited periods; none have continued their blasting work for ten centuries in all climates from Mexico to Greenland. It is not unreasonable, therefore, that its approach should be hailed with terror as is the approach of almost no other disease. Yellow fever and Asiatic cholera, even, have caused no such potent and widespread destruction. The very air it taints carries infection; garments in contact with patients carry their baneful power for years if shut up in tight closets; it can be communicated by mail or by hand, by railroad, by ocean voyage, by money, and by manifold means which cannot be guarded against. It is not only dangerous, but loathesome in its progress; it drives away a man's friends, and often thrusts a beautiful woman into unutterable tortures, and leaves her sometimes a wreck for life, with ruined health and disfigured countenance. When to all this is added its persistent reappearance at almost definite periods, it is not to be wondered at that small pox scares are so dreadful and so common.

"Why, vaccination is the guardian angel of the human race; and to the memory of Jenner should be erected the grandest monument ever conceived. But, come to think of it, no; great monuments are erected only in honor of those who kill, not to the memory of those who save. To be sure vaccination and even revaccination are not always preventives. But the percentage of cases of persons who have been vaccinated are small, and the deaths smaller. Of course, there have always been masses of people and some few physicians who have opposed vaccination. And there have been scrofula and other humors transmited through vaccination. So, men have fallen out of windows and off roofs; but would you do away with windows and roofs in consequence? Let me impress it upon you, my friend, that—"

Theodore Roosevelt

(This appraisement of the personality and character of our ex-president is from the pen of Professor G. D. Herron, a cultivated American educator. It was written for the New Age, a London weekly devoted to politics, literature and art, and it was printed in the issue of April 28th.—Editor's Note)

I have been asked by the New Age to write about Theodore Roosevelt. It is difficult to write of so dominant and delusive a personality without in some measure using language that fits the subject. In both word and deed is Mr. Roosevelt himself so terribly personal that it is impossible to write about him in an impersonal way. To speak of him in any terms that at all characterize him is to lay oneself open to the charge of personal feeling. I confess I do feel deeply about Mr. Roosevelt, but it is because I believe him to be the most malign and menacing personal force in the political world of today. He is the embodiment of man's return to the brute—the living announcement that man will again seek relief from the sickness of society in the bonds of an imposing savagery. He is a sign, and one of the makers, of universal decay. He is the glorification of what is rotten and reactionary in our civilization. To speak calmly of one whose life and achievements are a threat and an insult to the holiest spirit of mankind, this is not easy for anyone who cares about mankind, or carries within himself the heart-ache of the generations. About other men one may write judicially, and leave something for inference. But one can only truly write about Mr. Roosevelt by telling the truth about him; and that means the use of plain and terrible words. That is the tragedy and terror of having to speak of him at all.

Quite recently I have been criticised for saying that Theodore Roosevelt is the most degrading influence in our American public life and history. I said this because it was true. It is what many thoughtful Americans know; it is what no one with a reputation to lose will say. We are all afraid of him; we are afraid of him just as we are afraid of the plotted revenge, of the bludgeon from behind, of the knife in the back, of the thief in the dark. No one knows what this man will do if one enters the lists against him; but whatever he does, it will be to avoid the question at issue, and to come at you unawares: to seize an advantage that only the dishonorable and shameless accept. Whatever he does, he will never fight you fair; he will never strike a blow that is not foul. In some respects, Mr. Roosevelt has the field quite to himself; the majority of men have still some rudimentary feelings about the truth; and if not this, then an ordinary sense of humor, as well as the lack of opportunity, saves them from any foolish attempt at competing with Mr. Roosevelt in the art of clothing flagrant falsehood with the garments of moral pomp. It is notorious, too, that no man will now contend with Mr. Roosevelt because no man will so demean himself as to fight upon Mr. Roosevelt's terms. It is also notorious that Mr. Roosevelt will avail himself of this fact, as he did in his controversy with Mr. Edward H. Harriman; as he did in his amazing and disgraceful articles against Socialism; as he did when he condemned, for the sake of his own popularity with a capitalist press, the two labor leaders, Moyer and Haywood, while these men were still on trial for their lives. He knows that his most bitter opponent will observe some of the decencies of combat. Observing none of these himself, he has all the choice of weapons; and he chooses without reference to the weapons of his opponent. Indeed, no white man would be found with the controversial weapons of Theodore Roosevelt upon his person. And no white man has had, or would wish to have, Mr. Roosevelt's opportunity for investing the most skulking personal revenges with the air of a champion of the public good.

But it is not against a mere individual that I protest. I object to Mr. Roosevelt from the fact that he voices and incarnates the fundamental social immorality, the doctrine that might makes right—that no righteousness is worth the having except that which is enforced by brute words, or brute laws, or brute fists, or brute armies. Mr. Roosevelt stands for a life that belongs to the lower barbarian and to the jungle. He has set before the youth of the nation the glory of the beast instead of the glory of the soul. The nation has been hypnotized and saturated with his horrible ideals, as well as by his possessional and intimidating personality. Of course, the nation is itself to blame, and in this reveals its own decadence, for the heroes we worship, and the ideals we cherish, are the revelations of ourselves. Yet it is this one man, more than all others, who has awakened the instinct to kill and to conquer, and all the sleeping savagery of the people. It is he who has put the blood-cup to the lips of the nation, and who bids the nation drink. And one of the strangest ironies that ever issued from academic ignorance, and what will prove to be one of the historic stupidities, is the endowment of this naked militarist with the Nobel Peace Prize; and this because, in the interests of the great bankers and of his own military policy, he was instrumental in depriving Japan of the full fruits of her victory.

Theodore Roosevelt leads a recession in the life of the world. He betokens the enfeeblement of mankind, its lack of a living faith. He is the ominous star of the New Dark Ages, wherein the faithless soul of man will seek forgetfulness and excitement in military murder and political bestiality. It is true that Mr. Roosevelt has imposed upon the world an impression of strength; but he is essentially a weakling, an anthropological problem, a case for the pathologist. His psychology is that of the savage at one time, and of the hysteric at another. Intellectually, he is an atavism, the recrudescence of an antique type; he belongs with the rulers of the Roman degeneracy, or with the lesser Oriental despots.

And Mr. Roosevelt is the last man whose name should be spoken of in connection with democracy. He does not believe in democracy at all; nor in freedom at all. He is no more of a democrat than Genghis Khan or Louis XI. He likes liberty less than Cromwell did; and Cromwell liked liberty less, by far, than did Charles I. Only these are big names to put beside the name of a man so morally small, so ignorant of essential excellence, so ruthlessly inconsiderate of his fellows, as Theodore Roosevelt.

But supposing Mr. Roosevelt were one of the soul's gentlemen, supposing he politically meant to do social good, it is by methods that belong to the darkest phases of human history—the methods of the tyrant who believes his own will to be the only righteousness, and all opposition to that will to be the one unrighteousness; and who proceeds to stamp its opposers with what he means to be an indelible infamy, or to kill if he can. As the best example of this sort, Cromwell tyrannized over a nation, and over the souls of men, for their own salvation and for the glory of God. And this is the method by which every tyranny or tyrant seeks justification. It is the only method Mr. Roosevelt cares for or believes in.

Yet no man ever ruled other men for their own good; no man was ever rightly the master of the minds or bodies of his brothers; no man ever ruled other men for anything except for their own undoing, and for his own brutalization. The possession of power over others is inherently destructive—both to the possessor of the power and to those over whom it is exercised. And the great man of the future, in distinction from the great man of the past, is he who will seek to create power in the peoples, and not to gain power over them. The great man of the future is he who will refuse to be great at all, in the historic sense; he is the man who will literally lose himself, who will altogether diffuse himself, in the life of humanity. All that any man can do for a people, all that any man can do for another man, is to set the man or the people free. Our work, whensoever or wheresoever we would do good, is to open to men the gates of life—to lift up the heavenly doors of opportunity.

This applies to society as well as to the individual man. If the collective man will release the individual man and let him go, then the individual will at last give himself gloriously, in the fullness of his strength, unto the society that sets the gates and the highways of opportunity before him. Give men opportunity, and opportunity will give you men; for opportunity is God, and freedom to embrace opportunity is the glory of God.

The Revel at the Fairmont

During their recent convention the California Pharmaceutical Association held a smoker in the Norman room of the Fairmont which has been the subject of much whispered comment by all who were present. I hardly think the local druggists were responsible for the form of entertainment provided, because it was not the kind which would appeal very strongly to them. It was rather of a nature to tickle the crude susceptibilities of the bewhiskered visitors from the prune belt and the tall timbers. The entertainment ran largely to hoochee koochee dancing executed by damsels from the Barbary Coast attired in filmy and abbreviated garments. I am told that some of the dancers out-Salomed Salome in the abandon of their display and the suggestiveness of their contortions. It was red hot stuff and the rube druggists couldn't get enough of it. Spurred by their applause the dancers vied with one another in the presentation of unusual effects until the affair took on the complexion of a Paphian rite. One dancer was so bold that my pen modestly refuses to do justice to her posturings. Another feature of this smoker was the signs of an alleged facetious character which were tacked up all over the room. They were supposed to parody the signs that used to adorn the old-fashioned drugstore. In reality they were exceedingly broad and vulgar. It is surprising to think of an affair of this sort taking place in the Fairmont, but of course the management of the hotel had no means of knowing how the makers of pills and potions were going to entertain themselves. The Fairmont people would not countenance such an entertainment if they knew of it in time. In this case they didn't.

Phil Stanton's Airy Persiflage

It is a hundred to one shot among politicians that Phil Stanton, the Favorite Son of Los Angeles, is not going to poll many votes in the prune belt. Stanton toured Tulare County a few days ago in hot pursuit of support for his gubernatorial ambitions, crowning his efforts with a characteristic ebullition of humor in the town of Visalia. When the vote of Tulare is counted Stanton will begin to realize that his brand of humor is out of place in a political canvass. It was at the Palace Hotel in Visalia that Stanton emitted his little jeu d'esprit. Entering the dining room he seated himself at a table and when a waitress approached, asked her: "Have you any prunes?" Naturally the waitress replied that prunes were on the bill of fare, whereupon Stanton replied: "Well, keep 'em." The waitress failed to see the joke and all those to whom she retailed the incident were equally dense. Some were so deficient in the sense of humor as to feel that it was a gratuitous insult and this feeling is spreading through the prune belt, to the detriment of Stanton's candidacy. Which shows how careful an office seeker should be about the diffusion of airy persiflage.

A Letter from "The Barbarian"

The following letter anent my recent comments on "The Confessions of a Barbarian" may prove of interest:

May 19, 1910.

To the Editor of "Town Talk,"
San Francisco, Cal.

Dear Sir: I was very much amused by your review of my book. Far be it from me to challenge your critical judgment! But you will perhaps permit me to correct two misrepresentations of fact:

(1) I have never boasted of any relations with the Kaiser, interviews to the contrary notwithstanding. You know as well as I that it is impossible to get an idea out of a newspaperman's head, once it is rooted there.

(2) In the second place, you state that the love letters quoted in my book are products of my own imagination. If your paper is willing to defray the expenses, I shall be glad to render an affidavit to the effect that the letters reprinted in the chapter in question are literal translations of the German originals, with the elision only of such portions withheld from publication for very good and adequate reasons.

Let me also state that I have no intention of suing you for libel.

Very sincerely yours,
—George Sylvester Viereck

A Confession of Disappointment

I cannot help feeling a good deal disappointed to learn that the lusty blood of the Hohenzollerns does not course in the young veins of Mr. Viereck. I did not think the less of his talents because I imagined that there was a bend sinister on his coat of arms. I have not the vulgar horror of illegitimacy. In Richard Savage's too little known poem, "The Bastard," I have always found much that was admirable. I have never blamed Davenant overmuch for boasting his left-handed descent from Shakespeare. Because the dilettante of Strawberry Hill was the natural son of old Sir Robert Walpole I have never thought the less of his Gothic romance or of his gossipy letters. If Lord Chesterfield's illegitimate son had inherited the literary skill of the polished letter writer, his father, I would regard him with equal respect. To come closer home I think neither more nor less of an American president because I am firmly convinced that he was the natural son of Aaron Burr. In short, those who wish to understand my views on the subject of bastardy need only read the interesting remarks which Balzac makes in his "Catherine de Medici." So I am disappointed to receive Mr. Viereck's disclaimer. My statement of his descent was founded on an article published about two years ago in the New York Times Saturday Review of Books. The article was signed by Otis Notman (obviously a pseudonym) and contained the following statements:

A grandson of the great Kaiser Wilhelm is living in New York. He is an editor and a poet—many regard him as among the greatest poets of the age. . . . . The fact that George Sylvester Viereck is a grandson of the German Emperor, William the First, and a cousin of the present Kaiser, has been asserted by his friends, and has lately been whispered about in the literary coteries of the city. The circumstances that the parentage of Mr. Viereck's father was openely declared at a Socialist meeting a day or two ago, and that the young poet, when asked about the matter, confirmed the truth of the story, make it possible now to print it. . . . . Mr. Viereck does not voluntarily tell the story of his descent, though he freely admitted the truth to me. . . . . "The story of Viereck's parentage," said Alexander Jonas, editor of the Volk Zeitung, yesterday, "is taken as an authentic bit of history by all Germans who are conversant with the life of the old Emperor William."

Otis Notman goes on to tell of the romantic attachment which existed between Edwina Viereck, the poet's grandmother, and the Emperor, then King of Prussia, in the days of the Revolution of 1848. To Otis Notman Viereck is quoted as having made this statement: "I would rather have written 'Nineveh and other Poems' than be the German Emperor today." The Times Review of Books is a conservative paper, yet the week following that in which Otis Notman's article was published, we find the editor referring to Viereck twice as "a Hohenzollern." If Mr. Viereck ever set the editor right, the retraction has escaped me.

Sapleigh—Ah, speaking of electricity, that makes me think—Miss Keen—Really, Mr. Sapleigh? Isn't it remarkable what electricity can do!

Older the Uplifter

Verily the way of the uplifter is hard. Take for example Mr. Fremont Older, and by way of illustration, his unvarying experience in his beloved cause of morality and civic decency. Rebuff is his portion and rebuke the staple of his diet. No sympathy or encouragement does he get from his fellow citizens; no acclaim save that which he gives himself in the columns of the one virtuous and incorruptible journal. For a time it was thought that the repeated miscarriage of his designs was due to an unpropitious environment. The supposition was that San Francisco was incorrigible, as far beyond regeneration as Sodom, as passionately devoted to corruption as Gomorrah; that the filth of an Augean stable was more congenial to the perverted taste of the people than the balmy air of the glorious gardens of Hesperus amidst the Isles of the blest. This supposition has been exploded. Like Hercules of old our giant of reform, his zeal undiminished despite the futility of his club and his arrows against the Nemean lion of corruption, has wandered afar in the performance of his labors but to learn that he is a prophet without honor abroad as well as at home. The honest farmer of Marin County is as callous to the benign influence of Older as the unregenerate citizen of the modern Babylon. And now according to Mr. Older there is no honesty among farmers. By the outcome of the Flannery case he is convinced that it is as easy to seduce a farmer as a metropolitan merchant. True, while the trial was in progress he was of the opinion that only two jurors had been tampered with, but the verdict made it clear to him that the whole jury was debauched. Hence the repetition of the old familiar editorial whine that so often saluted our ears in the days not long past when after vain efforts to intimidate juries the public was advised that the machinery of justice had broken down.

The Frankness of Battarus

Mr. Older in my opinion is unfortunate in his methods. As a crusader in the interest of public decency he pretends to be more decent than he is, and juries regard him with suspicion. Now this preposterous affectation is not at all necessary. If none but impeccable citizens were justified in attempting to advance the cause of reform there would be no prosecutions for crimes against the commonwealth. It has been said that if we all got our deserts we should all be in jail, but it does not follow that we must all be tolerant of all kinds of crime. It is because each of us abhors the sins he is not inclined to that the world is a tolerable place to live in. But Mr. Older seems to think it necessary to pretend that there is no sin that he does not abhor. Battarus had the right idea on this subject. I commend Battarus to the consideration of Mr. Older. Battarus pursued the pandar's ancient calling. Once upon a time he caused the arrest of Thales, a Phrygian plutocrat, for assault and battery, and he conducted the prosecution himself. Like Mr. Older he asked for a verdict in the interest of the people, but he made no virtuous pretensions. "Deem not that in protecting me," he said, "that you are guarding the interest of a poor pimp. No, the honor and independence of your city are at stake." He said a lot more in this vein, and he got a verdict, but he impressed the jury by a frank confession of his own iniquity. "I follow a disreputable trade," he said; "that I don't deny. My name is Battarus; and my father Sisymbus and my grandfather Sisymbriscus (both inglorious names) were pandars before me. When I ask you for a verdict, gentlemen, I am thinking not of myself but of all the strangers who take refuge in your city."

Older as a Witness

Older not only lacks frankness, he is given to dissimulation and misrepresentation. This is too bad. He is fighting for some good principles and occasionally he has a good case. But he never tries to win on the square, and the truth almost invariably comes out. It came out in the Flannery case when Mr. Older was on the witness stand. He admitted that if Abbott had not implicated Flannery the bunco man would not have been released from jail. In other words Abbott had to give the "right kind" of testimony to earn his freedom. This admission was of great benefit to Flannery, especially as Sheriff Taylor had sworn that Abbott had not implicated Flannery until after his second meeting with Older. A fine sample of Older's talent for frame-ups was given during the trial when he called for Jerome Bassity. Every day the Bulletin shrieked for Bassity, and told how important it was that Bassity should be put on the witness stand. On the last day of the trial Bassity appeared in court, and learned that he wasn't wanted. When the trial was over Older wanted to know why his testimony about Flannery's offer to "cut up the town" with him was permitted to go unchallenged. "Why," he asked, "didn't George Knight ask for the name of the man that conveyed the message?" The answer is, Because George Knight had too much sense.. As the testimony involved collateral matter the defense would not have been permitted to impeach the witness. Older knew that he was perfectly safe in giving the testimony. And the outcome has vindicated Knight's judgment. The verdict of the jury in effect pronounces false the testimony procured by Mr. Older in Mr. Phelan's sybaritic apartments and strengthened with liberal doses of whisky in a prison cell in San Rafael where the prisoner's feelings were harrowed up with pictures of Oscar Wilde's miserable experience in Reading Jail supplied by the esthetic editor.

How an Editor Can be Made Useful

Mr. Older has reached a point where he can be converted into a very useful citizen of this city. He can be made to serve the purpose of irradiating the understanding of men far from the madding crowd who are laboring under a delusion regarding the character of this community. The better Mr. Older is understood, the easier it becomes to understand San Francisco. I am therefore heartily in favor of the exploitation of Mr. Older in remote sections. I believe that he should be induced to contrive a frame-up in each county of the State in order that the people might appreciate his artistry and the effect of it on public morals. In every section of the State there are people who still believe that Mr. Older and the cabal which he represents have suffered most cruel treatment at the hands of the people of this city. The experience of Older and his employers is conclusive in the opinion of many an honest farmer and many a bucolic journalist that this community is unlike any other community under the sun. The belief is still prevalent in the interior that human nature in San Francisco by some mysterious chemical process has been rendered absolutely inhuman and that as a consequence our average citizen is possessed of exotic ideals and filled with curious, fantastic notions of morality akin to nothing on this planet. Now perhaps there is no better way of disabusing the minds of our neighbors of this fallacy than that of encouraging Mr. Older to propagate his frame-ups, to circulate his personality, to localize his slanders and disseminate his whines. It might be a good thing for the city to diffuse Mr. Older from San Diego to Siskiyou, to impregnate the atmosphere with him and leave the rest to the Board of Health.

The Woes of a Laureate

It appears that Mrs. Maclafferty has discovered the difficulty of wiving a poet. My sympathy goes out to her. Maclafferty is the author of a set of verses entitled "The City Loved Around the World." I think several thousands of these were printed and carried east by our exposition boosters, which proves that they are mighty poor judges of verse. Maclafferty's verse is not even mediocre. He is the Alfred Austin of San Francisco, the halting laureate of our Panama Fair—and an unsatisfactory husband. Who was it that was appointed poet laureate of England because he lived on very good terms with his wife? Maclafferty has attained the same distinction by the contrary route. While his verses halted his connubial bliss stood still. Perhaps Maclafferty thinks with Flaubert that "however refractory the Muse may be, she is better than any woman." In his case the Muse has been exceedingly refractory. "Art is wife enough for me," said Michelangelo. "Rhyme is too much husband for me" it is possible that the poet's spouse may have murmured when she applied for a separation. "The position of lover is not a sinecure," said Byron, and it seems that the position of wife to a poetaster is not safe. Again I condole with Mrs. Maclafferty. It is bad enough to ask a woman to live with a real poet, but to wive a poeticule must be punishment too severe even for heroic womanhood.

First Reveller—I say, old man, your wife won't do a thing to you when she smells the whiskey.

Second Reveller—When I'm near her I'll hold my breath.

First Reveller—You won't be able to. It's too strong.

Debut of a White Seal

A white seal made his appearance on the seal rocks the other day and excited a great deal of interest not only among the other seals but also at the Cliff House. It was the first time that anybody in this part of the world had ever seen a white seal. The stranger did not receive a cordial welcome. On the contrary several of the veteran members of the herd resented his intrusion and tried to prevent him from pre-empting a basking place on the rocks. But he would not be denied, and he spent the day warming himself in the sun and occasionally asserting himself in stentorian tones. When the sun went down he tumbled back into the water and started on a journey down the coast. John Farley, boniface of the Cliff, who is an authority on the zalophus Californianus, and who claims to know all about his habits the distance that he covers in his excursions and the why and wherefore of his trips, says that the white seal will return in about two weeks and sojourn in this neighborhood for some months. "He is now a member of the seal-rock herd," says Farley. "His visit the other day was for the purpose of being initiated and selecting a partner, and from the manner of his departure I am satisfied that he arranged everything satisfactorily." Sam Rucker who is as much of an authority on Farley as Farley is on seals is sceptical. He says that if there was a white seal on the rocks it was one that had been kalsomined by Farley either to advertise a certain brand of champagne or to supply a pretext for a monologue on his favorite topic. But whatever may be the truth regarding the seal's coat, the fact is that a milk-white seal did visit the rocks and spend a day there.

Maud Allan's Probable Receipts

I asked an experienced theatrical man what he thought was the probable total of the receipts for the Maud Allan dancing exhibitions. He calculated for a short time and told me that he thought she played to a business of about $30,000 in her nine recitals. He said he thought she received about $800 for each performance in this city, although gossip has had it that she received as much as $2,000 every time she danced. At $800 per performance Miss Allan's share of the takings would be $7,500 in round numbers, not a bad sum for the amount of work done. It seems that there are a good many fingers in this dancing pie and that every finger must get its plum. Miss Allan must first of all give Butt, her London manager, his proportion of the receipts. R. E. Johnston is her manager for the United States and he must be taken care of. Klaw and Erlanger also have some sort of a financial claim which must be settled out of every "gate" though I do not understand just where they come in. Then of course there is the local manager who supplies the theater and the orchestra, in San Francisco Will Greenbaum. So it is plain that Miss Allan has to cut up her earnings with a good many claimants. In spite of which I understand that she has waxed very wealthy. Miss Allan's father has been in town with her, having come on from London to watch her reception in her old home. He is introduced as "Miss Allan's father, Mr. Allan."

Mrs. Mighels' Apologia

The following letter has just come to me from Mrs. Philip Verrill Mighels apropos my comment on her cremation of what she considered books of evil tendency:

1607 Baker St., S. F.
May 21st, 1910.

To Ye Editor of Town Talk:

Dear Sir: Although I have been quite ill for a week, yet it has been in my mind to take up your challenge as to whether I had the right to set myself up as an authority on the values of things literary.

If my time is short I must speak. If it is long so much the better. I can then prove what I say.

I know it is popular nowadays to belong to the ephemera—those daintily winged insects which flitter and glitter in the sunlight for a brief hour extolling themselves for their just-bornedness and their soon approach of finality. Now my mother belonged to the immortals and she trained me in the ways of the immortals—to live long, to think much, to die gloriously to earth which is the gateway to heaven. What do I mean by that? Why that she never ceased gleaning the wisdom of the ages which she tried to pass on to me. In the next place I sat at the feet of Adley Cummins when I was nineteen, and he read to me in the years following from the priceless lore of his research from sixty languages and dialects. He bought for me translations of the stories I liked best—that of "Damayanti" and "Shakuntala" from the Sanscrit; he shared with me everything that he found as the pearl-diver would give his sweetheart the choicest gems he brought up from the sea.

I have met graduates of universities who talked pompously of the study of English literature and prated of Shelley's "Skylark." But when I asked them of "Prometheus Unbound" they dismissed it haughtily as of little worth because the professor had not given it to the class. But I read "Prometheus Unbound" aloud to my three-year-old child who bade me go on, the same as my mother had read Byron's "Manfred" to me at that age and I had said go on. "More."

Do you get a glimmering of what I mean? There is a hereditary instinct for values literary which cannot be taught in any university. And I have that.

At the age of eleven I roamed through the library of the late Judge Turner who included on his shelves many of the works that the members of the Bohemian Club of today take great delight in—Boccoccio's Decameron, Montaigne, racy French volumes of the most approved quality. I read Don Quixote, and what was worse, Gil Blas with equal fortitude, bothered only to know what a ragout might be. Those people were always eating ragouts, with such a relish that I doubted very much if it were a simple stew they were raving over, such as we had. If it were then they were silly people. Already I had mastered the Arabian Nights—Edward Lane's edition. Next came Les Miserables translated by Chas. E. Wilbour—the edition that was sent to the front in the time of the Civil War so that every soldier came back from the war prepared to be the protector of some helpless child as was Jean Valjean who was the real hero of that hour. I have seen other translations of this volume I would not permit to enter my house for they are vile and unspeakable. But I had Wilbour's translation and I decided definitely that no other book equaled the one that told the story of Cosette. . . . .

Today I say the same; it is the greatest novel that was ever written if you get Wilbour's translation. When Adley Cummins read it in the original French he was moved to laughter over the extravagances of the great author's cerebrations. It was spoiled for him and for me too, nearly. Adley considered this translation into English better than the original for our people because it was more sane. So you see it is not a small matter, this choosing of our books, when a masterpiece strikes some as vile because of the lack of judicial quality in the translator.

We lived with the poets and the philosophers. They were our intimate friends. . . . . Adley Cummins' philological library which was the joy of students was destroyed during the great fire, in the Free Library, and will never be reproduced. The readers of the libraries seem to have lost their zest for the deeper culture and are all like a lot of sheep demanding the "best seller for that" month. I find very little initiative. Very little gift at finding out what is best on the shelves. I myself have gone back to Bulwer whom I find magnificent, and his pictures of English life as true today as when they were written.

But it matters little about ourselves. The grown are already either made or broken. I am raising my protest for the children. I think we ought to give them a chance for their lives. My ambition is to establish a "Little Library" for the younger children—to give them things to read that are full of the zest and joy of living—not pages full of sneers and jeers at life and what it contains.

I was taught much by my own daughter who had this instinct for things literary developed to a remarkable degree. Her favorite book in childhood was Charles Carleton Coffin's "Story of Liberty." She carried it around with her under her arm at ten years of age and fairly absorbed it. She was so taken with "Aesop' Fables" that she began making up little stories like them herself. She also adored "Les Miserables" as the story of a kind man to a poor unprotected little girl. Children of the erudite have a hard time sometimes however.

Little Virgil Markham, son of the poet, has been fed on deep things since he arrived on this sphere but he does not fail to express himself. After a hard evening of reading aloud by an enthusiast of a certain kind, the child went to his mother and said complainingly, "I-don't seem-to-care-much-for-that Browning." So with my daughter, she came to me in London holding a book in her hand. "Mamma, I don't want you to read this—it is awful—I am sorry no one told me and kept me from doing it—I don't want anybody else to read it. Shall we pour kerosene on it and take it down in the yard and burn it up!" I agreed with her at once and that was the first literary bonfire I ever assisted at. The book was "Camille." When the children of my neighborhood tell me they hate that "Alice in Wonderland," that they think her too silly for anything and that they cannot read it through—I feel that we ought to do better than to thrust upon them such things. When a boy asks, "Shall I bring Peck's Bad Boy and put it in the fire?" I think it about time the authorities were waking up and doing something better for the children, than letting them run at large in literature like homeless and parentless beings.

I would recommend that missionary work of this kind be done in different neighborhoods individually.

Finally, I have no wish to do away with books that reveal the truth in a human way. I burned "Black Rock" because it was false. I keep "Anna Karenina" because it is true. No gang of men in a mining camp are going to stay away from a side-show to listen to one woman sing "Shall we gather at the river." The mixing of religion and pruriency together is very offensive to me. I think the Sunday School libraries should be overhauled. My last word is a quotation from Adley Cummins, "Life is short and time is valuable." Why not seek the things worth while?

Very sincerely yours,
—Mrs. Philip Verrill Mighels.

Morality and Art

Mrs. Mighels makes the Tolstoian assumption that a book cannot be a great work of art unless it is moral. The difficulty with this assumption lies largely in formulating a definition of morality which will be generally acceptable. What Tolstoi and Mrs. Mighels would call immoral other authorities insist on regarding as highly moral. Is it not simpler and more logical to accept a work of art in accordance with its author's intention? It might not have been the intention of the author to amuse high school girls—he may have written for grown-ups. And if his work is a work of art it will not prove harmful to mature minds. Mrs. Mighels claims a hereditary instinct for literary values, yet she brackets Boccaccio and Montaigne with "racy French volumes of the most approved quality." "I read Don Quixote, and what was worse, Gil Blas," she writes. Are we to infer that Don Quixote is bad and that Gil Blas is worse? If that is Mrs. Mighels' meaning, her instinct for literary values must be at fault. A nice sense of literary values would hardly prefer the translation of a masterpiece to the masterpiece itself, would it? It is a truism that all great books lose in translation. Does Mrs. Mighels mean that Hugo loses in translation something which he would have been better without? I am afraid Hugo would exclaim, if he heard this, "traduttori traditori!" The story about Mrs. Mighels' little girl is interesting, but of course we are not to infer that Mrs. Mighels allowed her daughter to act as her literary censor. The spectacle of a mother and daughter cremating "Camille" —(I suppose Mrs. Mighels refers to "La Dame aux Camellias")—does not impress me and I choose to imagine that in that instance Mrs. Mighels allowed sentimentality to obscure her sense of literary values. One more question: Is "Anna Karenina" truer that "Madame Bovary"? And if so, by what standard of truth? Art values must not be estimated in terms of personal prejudice.

The Nickelodeon Craze

Every theatrical man in town is complaining that the craze for nickelodeons has eaten into the vitals of the legitimate theatrical business. "The nickelodeons," said one of the complaining managers to me, "have emptied our galleries. They have not appreciably hurt the orchestra or the balcony but they have played the deuce with the gallery. Don't underestimate the gallery. The hundred dollars a night that the gallery used to mean to us was not to be despised. The gallery god is a great agent to spread the news of a good play—and incidentally to help damn a bad one. He is enthusiastic, a sound critic and apt to have more influence with his friends who are in search of theatrical amusement than the blase white-fronted chap who sits in the orchestra chair. Every good actor and actress will tell you that they are delighted to win the approval of the gallery god. And now he is being lured away from his old love by the spell of the moving picture. I cannot altogether blame him. The nickelodeon provides an entertainment that is as attractive as it is cheap in price. The films depict most dramatic events and depict them with consummate skill. The nickelodeons are putting forth their very best efforts to please the old gallery god. Can we legitimate theatrical men say as much? How long will the craze last? I cannot tell. I am not even sure that it should be called a craze. Why may it not be destined to remain as a definite department of the amusement game? It is from that viewpoint, anyway, that we theatrical men ought to reckon with its influence. There is no sense in our pretending that the nickelodeons are not hurting us or that they will not hurt us for long. The antic of the ostrich will gain us nothing. It will not win back the good old gallery god."

Edwin Emerson's Erudition

Our old friend Edwin Emerson, the Cuban colonel who is considered a great soldier by some men of letters and a great man of letters by some soldiers, blazed on the editorial page of the Examiner a few days ago. His brilliance was the erratic brilliance of a comet and it was of Halley's comet that he wrote. An erudite man is the colonel, albeit something obfuscated by the fogs of history. He speaks of Charlemagne "who ruled all Europe and other domains of the ancient Roman Empire." This is an interesting assertion but slightly inaccurate. Charlemagne did not rule all Europe, he did not rule domains outside of Europe and he did not rule the ancient Roman Empire. Colonel, you must look to Bryce and not to Gibbon for the empire which Charlemagne ruled. It was not the ancient but the Holy Roman Empire, a distinction with a difference. The colonel speaks of Plutarch, "the ancient Roman historian." Here again interest is gloriously independent of accuracy. My dear Colonel, don't you know that Plutarch was a Greek?

Fogarty at the Press Club

There was a jinks at the Press Club last Saturday night and Frank Fogarty was there. Fogarty became a favorite in the Press Club when he was last in San Francisco and he has been a good deal entertained by the newspapermen during the past week. He never tells in private any of the stories which he uses on the stage, that being against the rules of the vaudeville circuits, but he has such a wealth of material that he is never at a loss for a laugh-provoker. Fogarty was not the whole show at the Press Club jinks but he certainly made the biggest hit among a lot of very talented people. The newspapermen couldn't get enough of him. I left the club shortly before four in the morning and he was still sitting in the jinks room with an intent crowd about him, spinning convulsing Irish yarns. One of the best things Fogarty does is to recite John Locke's beautiful poem, "Dawn on the Irish Coast." I have seen natives of the Emerald Isle wipe away furtive tears under the spell of this heartfelt poem as recited by Fogarty. Another selection which made a great hit was one of his own compositions called "The Ould Neighbors," a recitation throbbing with pathetic truth. And then his description of the City of Geck, ending with the Geck anthem! It is as nonsensical as Lewis Carroll's "'Twas brillig and the slithy toves" and much funnier. Frank Fogarty is a great artist in his line and I am not a bit sorry that I stayed up so late listening to him.

Henry Took a Costly Nap

This jinks at the Press Club was a very successful affair. La Estrellita, the Spanish dancer from the Portola Cafe made a great hit with her original interpretation of the "Yip" song. She sings it with a knowing air, a rolling of the eyes and a shrug of the shoulders that give it an entirely new meaning far from its ordinary inanity. Senor Wanrell contributed to the program and of course the newspapermen insisted that he give them their favorite "Pagliacci" prologue. One never tires of hearing Wanrell sing that. Of course Nat Landesberger

The Always-on-Duty Telephone

Your Bell Telephone is on duty 1440 minutes every day. So is the telephone exchange; so are the toll lines which radiate through the neighboring communities; so are the long distance lines which connect you with far-away cities and other radiating systems.

The whole Bell System is on duty 1440 minutes a day—and if any of these minutes are not used, their earning power is irrevocably lost.

Like the Police Force or the Fire Department, the telephone is not always working—but it is always on duty and always costing money. But you would not be satisfied with the fire department if your burning house had to take its turn; nor with the police force if you had to wait in line to receive protection.

You want service at once. That is exactly what the Bell System endeavors to give you—immediate attention, instantaneous service. It strives to be always ready to receive your call at any point, and connect you with any other point—without postponement or delay.

It would be much cheaper if telephone customers would be content to stand in line, or if their communications could be piled up to be sent during slack hours; or if the demand was so distributed as to keep the whole system comfortably busy for 1440 consecutive minutes a day.

But the public needs immediate and universal service and the Bell System meets the public's requirements.

was there. With Sigismondo Martinez at the piano he played a Legend by Wieniawski and the Humoreske by Dvorak. That reminds me of a funny incident. A. J. Henry, the photographer who is one of the most popular members of the Press Club, took forty winks during Nat's playing and as he was sitting in a conspicuous position his dereliction was conspicuous. When Landsberger finished one of the newspapermen called the attention of the chairman to Henry's little nap and suggested that fitting punishment be meted out. Randall Borough, the artist, who was in the chair, rose to the occasion. He condemned Henry to pay for his nap by buying the drinks for everybody in the room. Henry made a clever defense but bowed to the judgment. There was a big crowd at that jinks and I am not going to tell how much that little drowsiness cost the photographer.

Jack Crothers' New Emprise

Jack Crothers, for many years the business manager of the Bulletin, has surprised everybody by quitting his position. Some say that he found it impossible to get along with Fremont Older; others that he had a disagreement with his uncle, R. A. Crothers. Whatever the cause, Jack is out and "old man Crothers" has announced that he will henceforth be his own business manager, an arrangement not likely to last very long. Meanwhile Jack Crothers has undertaken a novel enterprise. Some time ago he leased to the St. Francis Hotel part of his fine farm at Niles. It is the intention of the hotel to raise there its own butter, eggs, milk and other dairy produce and I understand that Crothers is going to take charge of this "St. Francis Hotel Farm." as it is to be called. One of the things he is going to do is to stamp on every egg the date on which it was laid so that patrons of the hotel may be sure that they are getting a fresh article. The new enterprise is a very interesting one and its practical operation will undoubtedly be carefully studied by our other hotels.

He—What kind of stone would you like in the ring, darling?
She—Oh, Jack, dear, I've heard so much about baseball diamonds. Do you suppose they are very expensive?

Mr. Wilson Loquitur

"Running a hotel is a very different undertaking from running a steamer," mused Mr. Alva Wilson, the clever assistant manager of the St. Francis. "I never realized this point clearly until recently when I was the guest of the genial Captain Cousins on the steamer 'President.' On the surface it might seem that to take care of passengers on board a steamer would have very much in common with the business of running a hostelry, but it hasn't. I was in Captain Cousins' cabin one day when a tap came at the door. It was a woman in the lowest depths of despair from sea sickness. 'Oh captain,' she wailed, 'what shall I do to get over this terrible seasickness?' 'Take a train,' replied the captain quite seriously. A little later there came another tap at the cabin door and there was the apparition of another woman with much the same question. 'Go out and lie under a tree and you'll feel better." gravely advised the captain. Now we hotel men are pestered with more foolish questions and demands than a sea-captain, but do you think we would dare to treat them in this flippant manner? I should say not. We must take a serious interest in everybody's little troubles and perplexities or our hotel would soon become unpopular. But the sea-captain seems to be a licensed jester; tradition makes all sailors gruff and rough and nobody thinks of being offended when the captain rips out a rude remark or advises a woman suffering with mal de mer to lie under a tree. Yes, sir, running a hotel is a very different undertaking from running a steamer."

Local Man Writes a Play

Waldemar Young who used to be dramatic critic on the Examiner and Chronicle has written a play for Frank Fogarty, the "Dublin minstrel." Ever since Fogarty played his first vaudeville engagement in this city over a year ago Young has been traveling with him as his publicity agent and their association has resulted in Young writing a play which Fogarty will try out next season. The central character of the play is an Irishman who has slowly risen to affluence in New York, raising a family of three children. As the children grow up they become ashamed of their father and of his old friends and simple tastes. The action deals with what happens when this domestic situation reaches its crisis. The play will be called "Kerrigan," "The House of Kerrigan" or by some similar title. The central character was of course built to suit Fogarty and he should score heavily in it. It will be a novelty to see a vaudevillain pass to the legitimate drama. In the past few years the trend has been in the opposite direction. This is not "Wallie" Young's first essay in dramatic writing. With Race Whitney he wrote "The King Maker" which was produced successfully at the Princess and he has also written skits for the Bohemian and Family clubs.

A Charmer from the East

A short time ago a young lady arrived at the St. Francis Hotel, registering from Washington, D. C., who in the opinion of many of the guests at that hostelry was one of the most beautiful and most fascinating young women that had ever come out of the East for the titillation of western pulses. Chief among those who formed this opinion of her were Willy O'Connor, Clare Payne and young Hastings, the heir of one of our oldest established clothiers. These and other young men testified to their admiration for this entrancing traveler by all sorts of attentions. She and her chaperon were the guests at all sorts of jolly theater and supper parties; they had automobiles at their disposal whenever they chose to take a spin; and the flowers!—strangely enough the young lady never accepted their gifts of flowers and whenever a box of choice blooms was brought to her rooms she would send it to the telephone girls and the stenographers of the hotel without so much as examining the card enclosed. This eccentricity only added to her charm. Well, she has departed for the East once more and young Hastings' friends are telling that he followed closely on her heels. Already they are speculating as to whether there is to be honey on the moon. I am not sure. The admiring youth may find that the young lady's affections are already engaged by a wealthy New York stock broker of national prominence.

A New Standard in Entertaining

The fastidious esthete whose refined hospitality has been elevated to the dignity of art will hereafter have a new standard by which to compute the quality of lavish entertaining. A luncheon at the St. Francis during the week established this new standard. The entire space of the white and gold room was utilized for the function at which about one hundred and twenty-five women were the guests of Mrs. Henry Rosenfeld. Mrs. Rosenfeld was formerly Miss Duffy, the daughter of a wealthy sea captain, a woman of delightful personality and fresh charm. When the assemblage was viewed from above a fringe of animated color seemed to surround a long oval landscape garden which was in reality the table. In the center was a tiny lake from which radiated two small streams that wound their curving rills over the miniature garden. Dwarfed trees shaded the streams and scores of canary birds in cages were deftly concealed under the leafage. In the center of the lake a fountain spilled a perfumed spray over the lake in which gold fish gleamed. The stream was banked up with mosses to represent grass and a lawn effect was similarly contrived. Tiny tubs of blossoming plants stood about, giving a true scenic effect in perfect miniature. Small maple trees, cedars and pines gave the table the appearance of a park. The whole scheme was exquisitely wrought out in symmetrical proportions. Mrs. Rosenfeld who keeps her apartments at the St. Francis all the year round in addition to a handsome home in Oakland, received endless congratulations on her original artistry. Following the luncheon, at which many prominent society folks from both sides of the bay were guests, the company enjoyed bridge until late in the afternoon. For this the ball room was handsomely decorated with rhododendrons and other potted flowers and shrubbery. A score of beautiful prizes were awarded to the bridge experts.

Mrs. Alexander's Plans

Determined not to be the least bit outdone by Mr. Greenway who will spend the summer on the other side gathering ideas for the entertainment of the local Four Hundred next season, Mrs. Alexander is announcing to her friends that she also plans to leave soon for Europe. She will head straight for Paris to look over the latest whimsies in cotillon favors and ball room decorations. Mrs. Alexander is confiding to her friends that she plans to meet Mrs. Carolan in Paris. In fact, had she been able to rent her flat in time, she says she would have left on the same boat with the Carolans. Everyone knows that Mrs. Carolan is determined to assume social dictatorship next winter, for the Czar is said to be seriously thinking of quitting the throne. It is thought that he only hesitates because he wonders on whose shoulders his gorgeous mantle will fall. Mr. Greenway and Mrs. Carolan are the very best of friends, for they have many ideas of social arbitrament in common. Will Mrs. Carolan campaign under the banner of Mrs. Alexander or will she prefer Greenway? Speculation is whetted by the difficulty of answering this question. Mrs. Carolan has incomparable social assets that would make Greenway's last campaign invincible. I wonder if the conference in Paris will settle this tremendous matter?

Our Gay Night Life

The old town is kicking up its heels more merrily these cool summer days than it ever dared do in the polite and formal winter season. The younger set which really gives society its life and sparkle—I refer to the Peter Martins, the Samuel Knights, the Walter Martins, the Baldwin Woods and the rest of that coterie of young married couples—hasn't had such a frolicsome time since the Portola festival when they played ring-around-a-rosy down Market street to the music of the band. Good times? Why the past two weeks have been perfectly blithesome and merry, with not a bit of the fatigue and yawning of ceremonial society functions where every one is bored to distraction, hoping against hope that something will happen to clear the atmosphere of its deadly dullness. Just step any night into the Powell street cafes after the theater. The Columbia has been uncommonly well patronized and no one ever thinks of going home from the theater without a bit of supper. Since vaudeville has shared honors with the midnight menu at the popular cafes the old night life of the town is as brilliant and gay as it ever was during the palmiest days before the fire. At one of the big glittering places the other night I noticed the Peter Martins with a big table of guests, the handsome Mrs. Peter looking like a Gibson model and holding the center of attraction. Next to the Peter Martin table was Miss Grace George who came over from Oakland after the play with several members of her company and within flagging distance were some of the Maude Adams people, although that dainty bit of femininity was not in evidence. That cafe alone can seat twelve hundred and every table was taken.

Templeton Crocker's Pin

Templeton Crocker's pearl scarf pin is dividing attention with Miss Helene Irwin's engagement ring these days. Both are rarely gorgeous jewels but the more conspicuous position of Mr. Crocker's makes it more readily observed. In fact it is impossible not to observe it when its wearer is in sight. It is a pear-shaped pearl of milky whiteness as large as a Jordan almond and it rests on a background of dull green scarf with telling effect. Last Monday at the St. Francis the jewel caused a mild sensation in the corridor although Mr. Crocker appeared serenely unconscious of his several thousand dollar adornment. Miss Helene Irwin looks radiantly happy.

She is Fond of the Cliff House

Miss Maude Adams is a passionate lover of the sea and since her arrival here has spent a great deal of time at the Cliff House. She breakfasts there every morning with her maid and sits for an hour or so looking at the seals and the combers. Frequently she dines in the little red room with a group of her friends. Mr. Charles De Young of the Chronicle made her the guest of honor at a dinner at the Cliff House a few evenings ago. Miss Adams is not fond of public attention. She has not submitted to an interview so far during her engagement, much as the dramatic critics would have liked to exploit her. There is no doubt that she derives more pleasure from the silent contemplation of the Pacific than the attentions of society could give her.

Sentimental reasons caused Miss Genevieve Harvey to select Old St. Mary's as the scene of her marriage to Ward Barron. It was there that her parents were wedded. Immediately after the wedding on June 1 the young couple will go abroad. Miss Harvey will wait till she reaches Paris before buying her trousseau.

The Maud Allan Supper

Before departing for New York and London Miss Maud Allan gave a supper to several newspapermen and a number of others who helped to make her stay in this city interesting. Held in the Red Room of the St. Francis and lasting from eleven o'clock Tuesday night until five o'clock the following morning, it was one of the jolliest gatherings imaginable. After supping the party forgot the restrictions of formality and indulged in singing, dancing and romping like so many youngsters. Miss Allan was the merriest of all and declared that the memory of the occasion would dwell with her for a long time to come. In a little talk instinct with feeling she expressed her appreciation of the kindness which had been shown her in her native city and promised to return at the earliest opportunity. Among Miss Allan's guests were Miss Violet Carl Rosa, Mrs. E. S. Simpson, Miss Fernanda Pratt, William Allan, R. E. Johnston, Willard Barton, Ralph E. Renaud, Thomas Nunan, Edward F. O'Day, Ashleigh Simpson, Mackenzie Gordon, Dan Sweeney, M. Del Mue, Oscar S. Frank, A. C. Blumenthal and Fred Maurer. Miss Allan left for the East

A Prominent Los Angeles Club Woman

Mrs. Josiah Evans Cowles of Los Angeles has been much in the limelight during the recent session of the General Federation of Women's Clubs, which was held at Cincinatti. Mrs. Cowles who comes of fine old Quaker parentage, is the wife of a Los Angeles physician and has a young sister who has had quite a large measure of success as a concert singer. Remarkable tact, even in the face of trying situations and what might be termed disappointments by most women with aspirations for club honors, has distinguished the career of Mrs. Cowles ever since she has been before the public in the women's world, and that period covers a number of years. She stands in line to be chosen president at the next meeting of the General Federation. She declined at the recent session to accept the nomination for the office, arguing that the incumbent, Mrs. Moore, was the proper candidate. Mrs. Moore was then elected to succeed herself but the accident to her ankle gave Mrs. Cowles the opportunity to preside at important sessions. Probably no candidacy ever advanced in local club circles has caused less factional feeling than that of Mrs. Cowles who has been more than once just within and yet just without the reach of some important political plum. Upon the retirement of Mrs. Shelly Tolhurst at the end of her first two terms, the close of which saw her the most popular retiring president this important organization of wealthy women ever knew, Mrs. Cowles was advanced for the presidency in opposition to Mrs. Roy Jones. The social popularity of Mrs. Jones and that of her husband's family gave her strength enough to carry the day by a narrow margin over her rival, but while interest ran high, no bitterness characterized the campaign. Mrs. Cowles was a most gracious and tactful loser and when the time is ripe will doubtless step into the place most coveted by club women the country over with the good will of her associates everywhere. A candidacy advanced at an inopportune time is considered to have forever lost to another Los Angeles woman the presidency of another national organization of much importance while a small tempest in a teapot which another one was charged with causing at the moment of defeat is credited with totally eclipsing her chances for future honors.

The School of Employment

I have received an invitation to attend an out-door fete today to celebrate the opening of what is called the School of Employment and Vacation Camp and I am very curious to hear more of this novel project. An accompanying circular states that the school is to be established in the Canon del Trocadero at Nineteenth avenue and Sloat Boulevard, Parkside. Out door sleeping is to be one of the features. Miss H. C. Richardson is to be the director of the school and the subjects taught will include dress making, millinery, jewelry making, interior decorating, domestic science, horticulture, poultry raising and other useful occupations. The meals will be furnished by the students of domestic science. The patronesses of this novel enterprise are the following: Mrs. Henry G. Meyer, Mrs. L. L. Fletcher, Mrs. C. S. Aikin, Mrs. George W. Caswell, Mrs. C. A. Hawkins, Mrs. Elizabeth Gerberding, Mrs. Helen S. Moore, Mrs. E. L. Stebbins, Miss Catherine Hittell and Mrs. L. A. Hayward.

A Landscape Class at Greenbrae

Mr. Arthur W. Best, the well known painter, has started a summer class for the study of landscape at Greenbrae, a large ark on the slough having been engaged for the purpose. There is a novelty about this class which will commend it to students who might find their work irksome during the summer months under less pleasant conditions. The outdoor classes will be conducted, however, in conjunction with the regular sessions of Best's Art School under the personal supervision of Arthur and Alice Best. Both the life and landscape classes will be continued throughout the summer. Mr. Best expects to paint a number of canvasses which will be exhibited in the fall.

Nearly a Prize Winner

Miss Eleanor Gates, the wife of "Dick" Tully, received one of the five honorable mentions in the contest started by Martin Beck for the best one act play contributed for presentation at the Actors' Fund Fair in New York. It is called "Judge" and will be seen on the Orpheum circuit. The $250 prize for the best sketch was won by C. T. Dazey who submitted a sketch called "The Old Flute Player." All the five honorable mentions were won by women. There were 1853 competitors. Dick Tully, it will be recalled, wrote the first version of the play made popular by Belasco under the title "Rose of the Rancho" and also "Cupid the Cow Punch." I believe this is his wife's first attempt at dramatic writing. She has hitherto confined herself to novels and short stories.

In the Social Spotlight

Mr. and Mrs. M. H. de Young and daughters sailed from New York on May 18 for Europe on the White Star Line S. S. "Oceanic." Miss Kathleen de Young was the recipient of a great many floral offerings from her friends in New York City.

Miss Jane Oliver, Miss Lillian Ethel Fisher, Miss Elizabeth Price and Miss Clara J. Dippel took part in the exercises. An address was delivered by Rev. Frederick W. Clampett, D. D. The graduates were Miss Lillian Ethel Fisher, Miss Carmen Herrerias and Miss Alma Stevens Pennington. The next term of the Institute will begin on August 1. Mrs. Uriel Sebree, the clever and popular wife of Rear Admiral Sebree, retired, will be at the Fairmont for a week or so longer before leaving for her home in San Diego. Mrs. Sebree has a host of friends in this city and her time is largely taken up in social entertainments planned for her.

Dr. W. A. McEnery, the well known club man and athlete, winner of the recent Marathon walking race from Burlingame to Del Monte, has given up his apartment at the Fairmont and departed for a three months' trip to Europe.

The exhibit of the San Francisco Artists Society this week at the Palace Hotel brought out a large and appreciative audience on Tuesday evening, the opening night. The exhibit is representative and presents many excellent canvases by the best known among the younger artists of the city. Among the exhibitors are Cadenasso, Theodore Wores, Latimer, Del Mue, Sparks, Matthews, Joulin, Charles Dickman, Haig Patigian and many others. The exhibition is open to the public the entire week. It is being held in the concert room.

Sir Robert A. Hadfield and Lady Hadfield of London were passengers on the Japanese liner Tenyo Maru which recently arrived in San Francisco from China and Japan with the largest passenger list she has ever carried. Lady Hadfield is a sister of United States Attorney-General Wickersham and she and Sir Robert will pay the cabinet officer a visit at Washington on their way home to England. Sir Robert and Lady Hadfield have been on a pleasure tour of the world, and after a week at the Palace intend to spend some time at Del Monte where they want to try out the golf links of which they have heard so much. Although he has been in the United States several times, this is Sir Robert's first visit to the Orient, and he was deeply impressed with what he observed.

Among the recent arrivals at Aetna Springs from San Francisco were Mr. and Mrs. Henry E. Nolan, Mr. and Mrs. Mansfield Lovell, Mrs. Bush Finnell, Mr. Phillip Finnell, Miss Flora Gabriel, Mr. J. A. Marsh, Mr. and Mrs. Baldwin Wood, Miss Helene Irwin, C. Templeton Crocker, Col. and Mrs. Frank H. Johnson, Dr. and Mrs. George K. Frink, Mr. and Mrs. H. E. Fischbeck and Mr. and Mrs. C. E. Hoppe.

Mr. E. A. Chase of Riverside, accompanied by A. D. Tharnel, Frank F. Chase and M. C. Gould arrived at the Potter Hotel during the week in a Franklin touring car. Another automobile party consisted of Captain and Mrs. Warner D. Symondson of Los Angeles. Mr. and Mrs. H. Clay Breeden of Los Angeles also motored up from Los Angeles. They were accompanied by Mrs. C. A. Moody and Mrs. H. C. Burmister and daughter.

Mr. R. W. Graham of Coalinga, brother of William Miller Graham and the latter's associate in many of his oil ventures, has arrived at the Potter for a short stay.

Mr. and Mrs. James Hall Bishop of Corona Del Mar Rancho, with Miss Bishop and Master Bishop and Miss Bruce, their house guest, are at the Potter for a few days.

Among San Franciscans at the Potter are A. A. Otte, L. M. McKinley, Mr. and Mrs. A. Deysold, F. B. Galindo, R. Forsyth, N. W. Jameson, M. R. Ellis, Mr. and Mrs. Rice, W. F. Morton, Benj. G. W. An auto party of San Franciscans made up of Mrs. Percy Tenroche, Mrs. G. H. Peters, Miss S. Fritz, Mr. E. N. Fritz and E. Fritz Jr. spent Wednesday at The Peninsula.

Mr. Anton Borel was host at a very delightful dinner party at The Peninsula Friday. Among the guests were Mr. and Mrs. A. M. Cotton and Mr. and Mrs. Lewis.

Recent San Francisco arrivals at the Hotel del Coronado included J. H. Wood, Miss Ricks, A. W. Noyes, S. Green, E. R. Keil, H. Judell, Arthur Glass, H. Heastand, A. A. Otto, E. N. Christman, D. E. Wasserman, J. A. Enquist, Oscar Boldeman, Robert D. Pike, R. Knighton, Mr. and Mrs. C. L. Damm, Miss Helen Allen and Miss Lillian Baker.

Mr. and Mrs. J. McIlroy of San Francisco are spending their honey moon at Del Monte. Mr. McIlroy is a prominent railroad man. Mrs. McIlroy is a perfect blonde and is always gowned most exquisitely.

The list of arrivals at Highland Springs for the week ending May 18 included the following from San Francisco: J. De La Montanya, Miss L. Chrome, Geo. Alpers, Mr. and Mrs. L. Cantel, Mrs. E. Keller, V. H. Owen, Mrs. T. E. Hopkins, Mr. and Mrs. Mansfield Lovell, L. A. Mills and Mr. and Mrs. D. E. Stevens.

Mr. F. E. Booth of San Francisco who has large business interests in Monterey, spent the week-end at Del Monte, motoring down in his car with his friends, Mr. and Mrs. A. Trepani, also of San Francisco.

Major-General Barry who has been for some time at the Presidio of Monterey has been doing some excellent work on the Del Monte golf links, having some very exciting and closely contested matches with Major W. K. Wright, Major W. M. Wright, and Mr. L. Berrien, the local professional.

Among the enthusiastic golfers at Del Monte who spend hours every day on the links are Dr. and Mrs. C. B. Jones of Los Angeles, both of whom have a well-established reputation as expert golfers.

The Italian-Swiss Colony's choice Chablis, Riesling and Sauterne are excellent white wines to serve with fish, while TIPO and Burgundy go well with the roast. All grocers carry Asti Colony wines.

A Japanese Fable

Once upon a time—so runs the story, which I quote from memory—a certain bald retainer called upon his lord and master, to have a long talk about various matters pertaining to the management of the large estate. It was winter, and when the noble lord came in, he saw to it that a liberal supply of glowing charcoal embers sent forth their grateful heat from a brazier set between them on the floor. Thus they sat flat upon the mats and talked, the retainer now and then uttering exclamations of astonishment at the wisdom of his sage employer, who was known far and wide for his sound sense and unfailing presence of mind. The while they talked, this latter quality received fresh and convincing illustration. For the charcoal, snappy and saucy in the frosty air, suddenly sent a glowing ember leaping into the very lap of the stately lord, full upon his handsome apron of brocaded silk. The bald retainer flew all to pieces in his helpless anxiety to relieve the situation—gazing wildly around for some implement to remove the red-hot coal, and sputtering like a sperm-whale in his excitement. But meanwhile, the master, with a calm remark to the effect that it was of no consequence whatever, had quietly inserted his hand beneath his silken apron, and, with the skillful "chuck" of a boy playing marbles, had shot the saucy fireball back into its proper place before it had even scorched the precious silk. When the excited retainer at length comprehended what had happened, he sat back upon his haunches speechless with admiration, unable to do anything but utter an occasional "Naruhodo" of rapt amazement over such marvelous presence of mind. He had learned a lesson—ever hereafter would he strive to emulate the matchless wisdom of his lord. Meanwhile, the lord sat talking as though nothing had happened, to his faithful, if somewhat abstracted, servitor, whose thoughts were now fixed on loftier themes than tenantry and rents. Would that he might have opportunity to imitate the wisdom of his master! As luck would have it, the opportunity was not long delayed. For the malicious charcoal once more vented its fiery spleen, a living coal leaping this time straight for the flat bald head of the retainer, where it lay and glowed with wrath. It was now the master's turn to become excited. He looked from side to side for some implement of relief; he clapped his hands wildly to summon the maid—and exclaimed:

"Why, man, that coal will burn straight through into your stupid brain!"

But the retainer sat perfectly cool and collected, an expression of calm and elevated superiority upon his suffering brow.

"Never mind," he murmured; "it is of no consequence whatever,"—and, mindful of his lord's example, reached up and chucked himself under the chin!

Bible Reading Up Country

An Auburn attorney defending a client accused of some crime demanded to know what the State's attorney expected. "Does he expect my client, like Daniel, to command the sun to stand still and have it obey?"

"May it please your Honor," said the prosecuting attorney, "I object to the gentleman's misquoting Scripture."

"I beg pardon," said the defendant's attorney blandly. "I forgot for the moment that it was not Daniel, but Solomon, who commanded the sun to stand still."

And this statement went unchallenged.

Somewhat Complicated

The Census Taker: Your name, mum?

"I don't know."

"Beg pardon, mum?"

"I've been divorced. At present my name is Mrs. Jones in this State. In several States it is Miss Smith, my maiden name, and in three States it is Mrs. Brown, my first husband's name."

"This your residence, mum?"

"I eat and sleep here, but I have a trunk in a neighboring State, where I am getting a divorce from my present husband."

"Then you're married at present?"

"I'm married in Texas, New York and Massachusetts; divorced in South Dakota, Missouri, Alaska, Oklahoma and California; a bigamist in three other States, and a single woman in eight others."

The Faith of a Celestial

A gambler, whose first name was George, used to visit a den in Chinatown and gamble almost daily. One day he rushed into the place and said excitedly: "Hip, loan me $10. Thanks. I'll come in and pay you tomorrow noon, if I'm alive," and out he went with the money. About 3 o'clock the next afternoon a friend of the gambler dropped in on the Chinaman and said: "Hip, where is George today?" and the confiding Celestial wiped his eyes with the corner of his blouse and replied: "George, him dead."

A Very Talky Vaudeville Bill

The Orpheum is no place for a deaf man this week. The bill appeals directly to the tympanum and if your tympanum is defective, bring your ear trumpet. Otherwise you will lose six out of the eights acts. Ordinarily deaf people should be fond of the Orpheum, for its entertainments are balanced very nicely between the eye and the ear. If you can't hear you can at least see. But this week there is very little to see. The amusement is auricular rather than ocular. If you are deaf you must be content with the Mascagnos who are acrobats and the Morriseys who are dancers. The dancers are a little above the ordinary and the acrobats a little below. Two of the Morriseys are loose-jointed fellows whom it is a pleasure to look upon; the other two are ladies who would be better in longer skirts. Their legs are too thick to soothe the eye. The rest of the bill is not for the deaf. It is all talk, six numbers of uninterrupted loquacity. One of the six is Frank Fogarty whose talk is warranted not to tire. If the deaf people only knew what they missed in not hearing Frank Fogarty life would become an insupportable burden for them. They might sell their souls to buy their hearing. Not only does Fogarty not tire, he positively refreshes. His jet of talk flows on the ear until the brain is flooded with good humor. Fogarty is no intermittent fountain; he gushes all the time at high pressure. He will keep on gushing until the springs of Irish humor are dried up, a contingency as remote as Home Rule. Cullen is another talker worth listening to. Like Fogarty he is no stranger to us. His "Thank you" and his Prince Albert are institutions. We welcome him with a smile, reward him with laughter and recall, as he goes away, that all his stuff is not new. I hope Cullen does not regard some of his jokes as institutions, like his Prince Albert. The coat will still be presentable when the jokes are threadbare. But I am sure Cullen will not keep them that long. Smith and Campbell are not high brows. Their talk is on rather a low plain, mounting occasionally to little hillocks where it catches the breeze of comicality. "Suey San" is talk pointed by a knife thrust. It is such talk as Chinese never talked in East or West, although white men have been making them talk it on the stage ever since "The First Born" came into its own. It is rhymed talk too, execrably rhymed talk. The deaf man need not worry because he misses "Suey San." The deaf man should be positively glad that he misses "Mag Haggerty's Father." There was trouble at the Davis theater once on account of something like this. Haggerty is a libel on the Irish. Only the Irish sense of humor which can see the funny side of a feeble insult saves him from being booed—a feeble chastisement suited to such a feeble offense. The man who explains the Curtiss aeroplane supplies talk that is interesting but not exciting. It is improving but it is not vaudeville. When an aeroplane can be driven from the flies to the gallery and back it will belong on the Orpheum circuit.

A Year of the New Theater

Mr. Louis V. De Foe, the capable dramatic critic of the New York World, devoted a page recently to a review of the theatrical season of 1909-10 in which he passed judgment on the first year's achievement of the New Theater. Some of his statements are well worth quoting here. He says in part: "The term 'American theater,' is perhaps misleading when applied to the New Theater, for the gorgeous art playhouse, reared by a coterie of millionaires in Central Park West, and opened on November 8 with impressive ceremonies, has proved anything but that during the first season of its existence. To the extent that it has almost wholly ignored the work of native dramatists and made no effective attempt to establish definite standards of manners, deportment and diction, it has been a disappointment even to its best wishers. A curious mixture of dilettanteism and Anglomania which cannot be expected to win the sympathy of the public has prevailed in its management and raised, as to the sincerity of its intentions, a doubt which, however, has not yet amounted to a prejudice. If the institution hopes to make its future glorious, its charity should begin at home and its encouragement should first be extended to our own authors and actors. On the other hand, it is unfair to form too hasty conclusions regarding the New Theater. It has had many difficulties to contend with, principal among which is its too great size for general dramatic representations and its faulty acoustic properties. This first defect is not likely to be remedied, but the hearing facilities will undoubtedly be improved by structural alterations before its next season opens in the autumn. It has also been hampered in the organization of its stock company by the difficulty of securing native actors of recognized ability, due to the latter's contracts with commercial managers. This may excuse the too great percentage of English performers in the company, but it does not explain why a London stage manager, out of touch with our tastes and points of view, was placed in control of its classical productions, a selection which the results of such productions have generally failed to justify. The institution might profitably have done a little more in its first season to cultivate the interest and sympathy of our native branch of the dramatic profession. Its coldness and aloofness have had a dampening effect upon the ardor of actors and audiences alike. The New Theater thus far has been building from the top downward, instead of laying a substantial foundation for its future. It has made an imposing display, but principally in matters least serviceable to the art it is meant to foster. An institution which holds the Comedie Francaise as its ideal and which aspires to create standards and to exercise a permanent influence over the public taste must be of slow growth. It cannot spring full-panoplied into the arena. It would have made better headway had its policy been more concentrated and had its directorate not kept their eyes so intently fixed upon the foreign stage. However, the energy displayed by the New Theater leaves no ground for complaint. In a season of twenty-five weeks fourteen productions were made, in twelve of which its stock company appeared. The plays covered a wide range, extending from tragedy to romantic melodrama and including both classic and modern comedies. Only two of these plays, neither of which revealed a very high degree of merit, were by native writers. "The Nigger," by Mr. Edward Sheldon, while based on a vital racial problem in our national life, was extravagant, immature, unconvincing and unpleasant; 'The Cottage in the Air,' by Mr. Edward Knoblauch, an American who has taken up his residence in London, proved to be a light romantic piece which depended more upon its scenery than its text for effectiveness. Its whimsical story almost evaporated in the expanse of the playhouse."

The Greatest Theater City

It is interesting to know that New York contains ninety-one regularly equipped theaters. London has fewer theaters and does not support them as well as New York. Paris and Berlin combined cannot boast as many as New York. The aggregate patronage of the stage in London, Paris and Berlin is probably not much greater than in New York when computed on the basis of the amount of money annually expended on dramatic entertainment. According to Mr. De Foe, the Parisian or Berlin playhouses might almost thrive on the sum which ticket speculators, generally with the connivance of box offices, extort each year from the New York public. Mr. De Foe says that speculation in theatrical property almost amounts to a craze in New York. He reminds us that Mr. Al Hayman, the head of the Theatrical Syndicate, has recently asserted publicly that a great financial crash is impending in the amusement world. He says that the absurd overproduction of theaters has greatly increased competition and that the growing popularity of cheap moving picture shows with their phonographic attachments has depopulated the low priced seats in galleries and balconies of the regular playhouses. Seven new theaters were opened in New York during the past year, three will be opened next year and as many more have been projected.

William Collier at the Columbia

An increasing interest in the Maude Adams engagement at the Columbia Theater was shown by the inability of hundreds to secure seats during the past week and already the advance sale for the third and final week of the engagement is such as to presage the selling out of the seating capacity at every one of the remaining performances. In "A Lucky Star," the comedy in which Charles Frohman will present William Collier at the Columbia for two weeks commencing Monday, June 6, the comedian is said to afford the amusement loving public more wholesome fun than it has been their lot to enjoy for many a day. In "A Lucky Star" Mr. Collier is said to be at his best. He takes full advantage of the opportunities which he has to create laughter and the clever situations with which the play abounds.

Miss Vaughan's Farewell in "Trilby"

For the final week of the Alcazar's regular season, and commencing with a matinee on Monday, is announced an elaborate production of "Trilby," Paul M. Potter's dramatization of Du Maurier's famous story. This play was last presented in San Francisco about eight years ago and Evelyn Vaughan persuaded Belasco & Mayer to revive it as an effective medium of her farewell appearance as their leading woman. It was in the title part of "Trilby" that she made her first emphatic hit in the East and that fact, coupled with the exceptional fitness of certain members of the Alcazar company to interpret the other principal characters, induced her to recommend it as a worthy vehicle through which to bid adieu to the public whom she has pleased so well during her two years' engagement here. In the cast with Miss Vaughan will be Landers Stevens as Svengali, Louis Bennison as The Laird, Will R. Walling as Taffie, William Garwood as Little Billie, Howard Hickman as Gecko, Maurice Stewart (specially engaged) as Zou Zou, Burt Wesner as the Reverend Thomas Bagot, Charles Trowbridge as Dodor, Adele Belgarde as Madame Vinard, Grace Travers as Mrs. Bagot, Bessie Barriscale as Angelie, with the remainder of the Alcazar favorites and many extra people in minor parts.

Pantomime at the Orpheum

Edward Abeles will present a dramatic play by George Broadhurst at the Orpheum next week. "Self Defense" is a pantomimic tragedy which tells the story of a mute Italian lad, charged with murder. Frank Stafford with Marie Stone and a beautiful English setter, will appear in a novel act entitled "A Hunter's Game." He imitates nearly every kind of bird and animal. Miss Lillian Ashley, a singing comedienne and mimic, will be at the Orpheum next week only. Harry Fiddler and R. Byron Shelton, colored entertainers, also come next week. Those who will close their engagements with next week are James H. Cullen, the Morrisey Sisters and Brothers, and Mabel Bardine & Co. Next week will also be the last of the Herring-Curtiss Aeroplane.

Parisi on the trombone. At the evening concert Franz Helle, the only Fluegel horn player of note in the country, will render Gounod's "Spring Song." George Mulford, the piccolo artist, will be heard in a selection of his own called "The Humming Bird." Ohlmeyer has arranged for Sunday band programs which will appeal to all musical tastes. For Decoration Day the programs will embrace a number of patriotic selections.

Cohan Musical Play at Ye Liberty

For next week, commencing with a special matinee on Monday, the Bishop players at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, will present Cohan's most popular success, "Forty-Five Minutes from Broadway." The stock company across the bay will offer it for the first time anywhere at popular prices, and this fact, coupled with the popularity of the piece, insures a week of crowded houses. All Ye Liberty favorites are to appear in the cast and they will have the assistance of an attractive singing chorus for the musical numbers. "Forty-Five Minutes from Broadway" will have the usual run of seven nights only, with the regular Saturday and Sunday matinees.

In the Limelight

Margaret Anglin will be here next month with her production of "The Awakening of Helena Richie."

Henrietta Crosman will take her company to Honolulu between seasons. She will present "Anti-Matrimony" at the Columbia and then will take the steamer for the islands.

Henry W. Savage has arranged for an elaborate revival of "The Prince of Pilsen" for a transcontinental tour next season.

Vesta Victoria, the great English music hall artist, will be heard at the Orpheum in the near future. It was she who made "Waiting at the Church" so popular.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—In explaining the sharp rise in stocks during the recent week there are two potent factors to consider, the marked improvement in the crop situation as a result of heavy rains over a wide area of territory, and the fact that negotiations have been concluded for placing large amounts of securities in Europe for investment. The importance of the latter factor is not generally realized by the large speculative interest in this country. It shows not only the stability of American bonds in the eyes of the foreigners, but also the opinion of leading bankers here on the outlook, and this covers legislation on corporate interests and probable tariff adjustment later. The market has shown excellent buying of good stocks on the foregoing factors and this buying usually leads to higher figures, barring accidents. In the coming week we would favor the purchase of the low priced rails.

Wheat—Generous and timely rains in the southwest insure a wheat crop to the limits of the acreage left standing. Texas will begin to harvest the latter part of the week, weather permitting. With European spot and future markets crushing steadily downward under the weight of the wheat that is being put upon them and millers in this country not yet recovered from the effects of their reckless overbuying of some months ago, the wheat promise is far different from that of a year ago. By this time last year the boards had been swept bare in every bin and warehouse in the country; mills were out of wheat and the flour trade was steady and at a normal volume. Patten had secured control of the local stock of wheat in December and following an energetic and able merchandising campaign, had in four months sold enough cash wheat—over four million bushels—to enable him to close his May deal in full control of the market. The crop of last year proved the second largest ever produced in this country—only 11,000,000 bushels below the largest ever raised—and it kept on pouring into these markets after wheat and flour buyers had enough. It is still coming and promises to continue until the next crop is harvested.

Corn—Fine weather for the growth of the newly planted corn allayed the fears of those who expected that the cold weather would give the crop a bad start. It also loosened up a good part of the supply of old corn that had been held back, awaiting the completion of spring work on the farm. The rush to market is by no means general. It is held back by replanting in some sections and by the unsatisfactory prices in others, but nevertheless a very fair volume of corn is now headed for all the big centers.

Cotton—We are entering upon the final stage of what has probably been the most remarkable year in the history of the New York cotton market and like many "finishes," the present situation looks as though it might be very interesting and even the most spectacular of the season. The cotton year began with a drought of serious proportions, and from a bad beginning, the crop had a series of disasters that made the proverbial "out of the frying pan into the fire" sound like a commonplace. With all this came a group of powerful bulls with a large following and then general speculation carried prices to the height reached in the last days of 1909, from which a spectacular drop occurred that put prices down almost three cents per pound. From January until the present time the market has had to contend with a battle of giants. On one hand is the most powerful bull clique that has ever operated in harmony, opposed to the large spot houses who were short of the market and who scoured the world for supplies. Conditions have changed greatly in the last month as to the outlook for the price of cotton futures and such changes have made the thoughtful look at the prospects for prices in a somewhat different light. Economy on the part of the spinners has done its part in keeping down prices, but when it is realized that the jobbers are willing to pay the increased cost for cotton goods caused by higher spot cotton, the mills will have to take our cotton at its market value. Therefore, outside of the very distant months there seems to be very little hope for cheaper cotton.

Cotton—The large sale of copper metal during the past week or so will go a long way toward holding down the copper surplus, but it can hardly be expected that the heavy transactions will be reflected in this month's copper producers' statement. In fact, one of the largest sellers of copper says that the statement for May will be a poorer one than that for April in which month the surplus was increased over 18,000,000 pounds; but he says further that after the next statement, the copper statistics should improve for several months on the side of the producer. Should the price of the metal show any further recession, it is more than certain that foreign interests will take on large lines and hold it for a rise. The metal makes excellent collateral as it is imperishable and bankers willingly lend on it in the London market. There was a steady drop in the exports from about 82,000,000 pounds in January to 31,300,000 pounds during April. These figures, of course, were for deliveries and represented sales of several months previous. It is the opinion of the large copper sellers that the foreign element will come into the market for large tonnages if the price looks attractive enough for a later advance and a profit, but owing to the large surplus now held there, it is doubtful if large amounts can be sold at much above 12½ cents. The trend of the copper stock market is for the better and it is conservatively thought that any of the good standard stocks are a purchase at the present level.

S. G. Chapman has just unloaded a shipment of 10 Hupmobiles which he is now equipping for delivery. This makes 20 of these cars received during the past four days all of which were sold before arrival. Twenty more Hupps are now en route from the East. These machines are a part of the additional allotment secured by Chapman during his recent eastern trip.

During the past week the Pioneer Auto Co. delivered 18 Chalmers touring cars and 14 Hudson tourings and runabouts; also 2 Loziers and 3 Thomas cars. The month of April was the largest month experienced by the Pioneer Company since the concern started.

been stated, was to proceed to Philadelphia, but it was only to escape the mob that was hunting me, not to shirk the indictment. I had preserved through every vicissitude of fortune the determination to one day stand my trial before a legally constituted tribunal, unjust as I knew the finding of the bill to be. Conscious of my own innocence, I had nothing to fear from an impartial jury, and was anxious honorably to wipe out that indictment from my record.

The circumstances which have been detailed had thwarted my project of going to Philadelphia, and there was now some prospect of men's minds once more returning into the channel of reason. Hence my every wish and hope was for the arrival of the hour when I could deliver myself up to the officers of the law, without the danger of being murdered by the mob, and I anxiously awaited the tidings the Doctor should bring from San Francisco as to the disbanding of the Vigilance Committee.

I was supplied every two weeks with all the papers and knew all that was going on at San Francisco, and in other parts of the State. I felt very confident that Mr. Buchanan would be elected to the Presidency, but as I saw but few of the eastern papers, I had no idea that Colonel Fremont could possibly carry the number of States that he did. I was thunderstruck when I heard the result, and seeing how nearly an anti-national party had caught us napping, I became a stronger Democrat, if possible, than ever.

About a fortnight after I had commenced sleeping in the house, an accident occurred which subjected my good friend the Doctor, to a serious loss; and as I was partly the cause of it, it grieved me not a little. A man whom the people at the ranch called Senor Benito came to the Dos Pueblos for the purpose of hunting deer. The first day of his arrival he went out with the rifle and killed five, bringing home with him nothing but the skins. He said it was too much trouble to pack the meat, and besides it was out of season. It struck me that it was a pity to kill the beautiful animals merely for their skins, which were only worth half a dollar apiece; so I proposed to accompany him in his next day's hunt, agreeing to bring home the meat myself. Accordingly we started the next morning, and had not been long on the hunting ground, before Benito killed a fine buck. We skinned him, and I hung half of the meat on a tree for my friend "Fred," (the Prussian) who was cutting poles for the garden some distance up the mountain, and packed the other half on my horse to the house. That night Marie Jesus cooked the meat in the garden, and notwithstanding its being a little out of season, every one about the place seemed to enjoy it very much. The next day I proposed to Fred a picnic in the mountains, on the spot where he was cutting poles. This he agreed to and accordingly we provided ourselves with bread, potatoes, Chili peppers, etc., and rode to the place where I had hung up the other half of the deer, and putting it on one of the horses proceeded up the mountain. As he was paid by the thousand for his poles, I agreed both for my own amusement, and in order that he should lose none of his time, to cook the dinner myself, which I managed to do quite to the satisfaction of both of us, and we enjoyed our feast heartily. As a full half of what we had was left uncooked, Fred proposed to let the fire continue to burn until the next day, when he would cook the remainder for his dinner. I suggested to him that there might be danger in leaving the fire on account of the dryness of the weather; but he thought not, and accordingly placed a large log on it and we left the spot. We had not more than got down to the plain when the sea breeze began to blow very fresh, and presently we observed that the mountain was on fire, and the flames rapidly spreading in every direction. So long as it confined itself to the mountain no great damage was to be apprehended, and I tried to comfort myself with the hope that such would be the case when I first saw the spreading of the flames. I was doomed, however, to disappointment, for as the night wore on it increased until everything for miles around was wrapped in conflagration, and before morning it had passed the Doctor's house, and it being the driest season of the year, not a drop of rain having fallen for six months, everything burned before it like tinder. The cattle, deer, and all sorts of game were driven in frightened throngs to the valleys, and as for rabbits and hares, baskets-full of them might have been picked up. Donna Rosa's brothers and several of the neighbors came to her relief, and I think I never worked so hard in my life, as I did in assisting to put it out. At night it was the most awful, and yet the most magnificent sight I ever beheld. Notwithstanding my sorrow and vexation, I could not but admire the fearful splendor of the scene. The mountain side seemed one vast nest of hellish serpents as the hissing flames coiled around the stunted trees, licking away with their fiery tongues, the dry twigs and branches. Ever and anon they would get into some hollow trunk and roar through it like a forge chimney, while dazzling spouts of fire shot through the knot-holes in its sides, giving it the appearance of a tree with branches of flame. They reminded me of the side lights in a brilliant theatre scene; but the back ground was a thousand-fold more terrible and grand. At length when it had got into the plain, with nothing but the short grass to feed it, we managed to get it under, but not until it had destroyed a vast quantity of pasture.

The Doctor's loss from the grass which had been destroyed, amounted afterward to nearly a hundred head of stock by starvation. As may be supposed, I felt very wretched about this affair, and the fact that I had expostulated with Fred against leaving the fire burning, was but small consolation to me. I had suggested the miserable idea of the picnic, and I ought to have insisted on the fire being put out. Notwithstanding the Doctor's severe loss, after that amiable gentleman had returned from San Francisco, and I was upbraiding myself to him for my carelessness, he simply replied, "Mac, if I hadn't had them I couldn't have lost them." He said that owing to his superior pasture land, his neighbors yearly lost twice as many cattle as himself from drought, and it was but reasonable he should sometimes have a little bad luck. As for "Fred," five hundred dollars of wages was due him, every cent of which he was paid without a word of reproach, and further employment procured for him through the influence of the Doctor.

On the second day of November, the Doctor arrived from San Francisco. He brought me several letters and messages from my friends, and all the newspapers. I ascertained by the latter that it was now pretty generally conceded on all hands that I was in Sonora.

The Doctor also brought me a kind message and a couple of bottles of excellent brandy, from my good friend, B. F. Johnson, Esq., the well known and popular proprietor of the Magnolia Hotel, in Sacramento. On the day of the election, while the Doctor and his people had gone to the Mission of Santa Barbara to vote, it struck me that I would write to my friend "Baldy." I did so, and afterward saw published, on the 19th of November, in the Democratic State Journal, the following extracts therefrom:

Letter from Ned McGowan.—A day or two ago, a letter was received in this city from the ubiquitous Ned McGowan, of Vigilance Committee memory. We have been permitted to read it, and we assure the reader that it is a genuine document. Notwithstanding the letters from Philadelphia, telling us that Ned is rusticating in that locality, and other reports that he is dying of the bowel complaint in Utah, Ned is still resident within the bounds of California, "was never in the enjoyment of better health." It will be seen from the extracts we publish below, that Ned, as usual, is disposed to laugh at his own troubles. He thinks, with Mrs. Gamp, that "them as lives in a walley must take the consequences of sich a sitivation," and he is resolved to make the most of the few creature comforts left him. The story of his escape from San Francisco and his wanderings, would make an interesting book, and since Ned is of a literary turn of mind, we have no doubt that he will put himself in print one of these days.

The letter is dated at "Hidden Diggins, Sky County, California."He says:

"Dear 'Old Baldy': Your 'Elixir of Life' reached me in due season by the hands of the best of men, and not a member of the 'purest and best' either, but a high-toned, honest, and intelligent son of the Emerald Isle, who has the good fortune to be well-off in this world's goods. You have my thanks, for it has been a long time since I swallowed anything in the liquor line half so delicious, and under any other circumstances, it would give me infinite pleasure to recommend your dark brandy to the drinking fraternity of this peaceful and glorious land of liberty!!! But, 'situated as I am,' I can only thank you by letter, and not in the customary manner, through the free, independent, and untrammelled press at the Bay; and further I will say to you, that to those who, like myself, can enjoy a bumper in solitude, having, for a season, gone into retirement, and quitted this gay and heartless world, auspiciously and wisely, it will prove an invaluable medicine."

It is evident that Ned found a great solace in his "Elixir of Life."

"I still like to hear something of you poor fellows, who are forced by circumstances to remain in it, (the gay and heartless world)—and particularly when the news is made the more welcome accompanied by such precious stuff—stuff! that's very significant, is it not? I wonder how I chanced to write that obsolete phrase—stuff, stuffer, stuffing! I was about writing you an apology for this lapsus penquae, when 'Chino,' who was looking over my shoulder, said that it was not quite blotted out of existence, being still extant in turkeys and chickens for Christmas, and besides, that in this election for President, the Democrats will be at their old tricks again and stuff the ballot-boxes from San Diego to Shasta.

"I am now studying the Castilian tongue a la Francais. My system of learning Spanish is far superior to Ollendorff's mode, particularly when the teacher is young and innocent. I will give you a small specimen of my improvement. Imagine me in a canyon, adjacent to steep and rugged mountains, where I daily retire for my devotions. A little boy runs up the canyon seeking me.

Boy.—"Don Edwardo! Don Edwardo!"

McGowan.—"Aqui! aqui! mi bueno muchacho."

Boy.—"Ariba, ariba, vamose!"

McGowan.—"Porque, mi bonito, pajaro?"

Boy.—"Bastante hombres en el casa, mucho malo -Vigilantes!"

"I heard enough, and quietly but not slowly, walked to the top of the mountain to catch the cooling breeze—that's all.

"I have often thought of the paragraph little Bartlett (Jules) wrote about me last winter. I like a good thing even at my own expense—anything but strangling—say what they please.

but hands off. After saying something about my acquaintance with a French lady, playing draw poker, etc., he concluded by prophecying 'that my political career, like my amours, would end in a blow up.' It was lucky, some folks think, it was not a 'hang-up.'

"'From mock to earnest, even into tones
Of tragic, and with less and less of jest,
To such a serious end.'

Resp'y your friend,
—Edward McGowan."

The Doctor's news, as regarded the Vigilance Committee and my chances for a safe return, were very discouraging. All of my friends who had written me cautioned me by all means to remain where I was till things looked better, consequently I had nothing for it but to stay quietly where I was, which I did till Christmas had come and gone. My life was pretty much the same every day as I have described it. Occasionally I would quietly ride over to Senor Ignatio Ortega's to purchase whiskey for the Indians; especially on Saturdays, when they would say to me in Spanish—"Tomorrow is Sunday, there will be no work, and we'll drink whiskey with Paisano." I amused myself very often by hunting. The country abounds in game of all sorts. A party, of which the husband of Marie los Angeles was one, killed no less than one hundred and thirty deer in one month. Geese too, and ducks were very plentiful, and could be got by going only a short distance from the house.

A great field sport of the Californians in the dull winter months, and by no means a contemptible one in point of excitement and danger, is lassoing grizzly bears. I saw several of them captured in this way. Both the horses, which are trained for the purpose, and the men, exhibit great quickness and skill in this dangerous sport. Relying on the activity and sagacity of their horses to keep out of the monster's reach, the horsemen soon have a lasso around one foot of the bear; and as quick as possible each of his other feet is similarly secured, and the horses hold all four of the legs stretched out in oposite directions, while he is despatched with a knife. One party which started out from Santa Barbara, succeeded in thus killing ten bears in one day. They are very numerous, and exceedingly destructive of the cattle

Now and then an incident would occur to remind me that I was not yet safe from pursuit myself. For example, one day the Sheriff of Santa Barbara, Mr. Heath, and his lady came to visit the Doctor and remained all night. The Doctor and I were just seating ourselves at the dinner table as the visitors arrived. I had barely time to get up and go into my room without being observed. I did not feel quite sure that even had he seen me he would have attempted to arrest me then, but I thought it prudent to take no chances. Marie los Angeles brought my dinner around the house to the window of my room, where I remained until night, and then taking a pair of blankets and my gun, I stepped quietly out and slept in the garden.

Not far from the house there was a kind of lagoon on the sea beach, where always might be found early in the morning, great quantities of ducks and geese. When I awoke in the morning I determined to go to this place and shoot a brace of ducks for breakfast. Accordingly I took my gun and proceeded down the canyon which led to the shore. On arriving there, who should I see but the sheriff. He too had a gun, and was there I suppose for the same purpose that I was. He said nothing to me, however, although I thought at the time he must have known me, and I quickly walked down the coast and so by a circuitous route back again to the garden, leaving him in undisputed possession of all the ducks in the pond. I thought as he was a stranger at the Dos Pueblos, it was a courtesy to which he was entitled. After he had gone, the Doctor told me that he had related to him the circumstance, and told him that I was perfectly safe from arrest by him, as he knew full well that I was only awaiting an opportunity to go to San Francisco in safety, and stand my trial.

About this time a queer old Indian came to live with the Doctor, who used to amuse me very much. He must have been at least eighty years of age, and according to the old chroniclers of the county he had been baptised sixty years ago. He was employed to look after the sheep, and protect them from the coyotes. The Indians about the place called him El Pastor, (shepherd). He used to keep his account of the number of the young lambs with notches on a stick. He could do very well until he got up to forty, but beyond that number he never could mark. Forty-one notches on the stick would have so confused his account that he could make nothing out of it. Any combination of numbers exceeding the aggregate of forty, was, to him, all the books of Euclid condensed into one problem. When asked how old he was, he would reply—"quien sabe—about forty," and that had probably been his answer to the question for at least forty years.

I used frequently to take my gun and roam up into the mountains where he was herding the sheep and try to talk to him Sometimes I would be quite low spirited and he would say to me—"Why are you sad, old man?" I would shrug my shoulders and say—"I don't know." He would then say—"Is there not brandy at the house?" I would tell him there was, and he would ask—"Why then are you sad?" He considered it unreasonable that I should wish for a greater share of earthly happiness than a bottle of brandy afforded. I beguiled many a weary hour in trying to study out the thoughts and machinery of that poor old benighted Indian's mind

88 FIRST STREET

At length the Legislature met, and I began seriously to prepare my plans to return once more to the companionship of my fellow citizens.

About the twenty-second of January, an Indian brought me from Santa Barbara, a box containing some clothing and several bottles of good wine and brandy, which had been kindly sent me from San Francisco by my good friend James W. Stillman, Esq. This box was found in Santa Barbara, together with several letters for me, by the Doctor, who immediately sent it to me, but put the letters in his pocket, intending to bring them himself.

On opening the box I found several of the late papers, and as I was glancing over one of them my eye fell on the words: "now that Mr. Broderick is elected to the United States Senate." I read no further. Forthwith I opened the brandy, and circulated it around among all the people of the ranch. I shouted and danced, and made the Indians do the same, and absolutely went wild with delight. I presented Donna Rosa with a bottle of sweet wine, and begged her to drink the health of my friend the Senator, which she did. The Indians did not know what to make of my antics, and I could only shout to them "Bueno para mi amigo." They knew that I had received some good news, and were not at all backward in doing their share of the drinking. I believe I fuddled every Indian about the place, and became su;ciently elevated myself.

The next day the Doctor came home, and we exchanged congratulations on the good news. He is himself a very warm admirer of Mr. Broderick, and had been making a night of it in town with some others of the Senator's friends.

I found among the letters which he brought, one from a friend informing me that preparations were being made for my return in order that I might stand my trial. Daylight had at last broken on the night of my misfortunes, and I anxiously looked forward to the hour when I might go back and mingle once more with my fellow citizens. At last that hour arrived.

On Wednesday, the tenth day of February, as we were sitting at the supper table, I heard a voice which sounded familiarly to me inquiring at the garden gate: "Is this Doctor Den's place?" The Doctor went out, and Donna Rosa and I followed him. It was at seven o'clock in the evening, and quite dark. It did not take me long, however, to recognize in the visitor my friend Captain J. Martin Reese of San Francisco and formerly of Philadelphia. He had just dismounted from his horse, which he had given in charge of a servant, and as I rushed forward to embrace him, the Doctor and Donna Rosa saw by my conduct that he was a friend. I introduced him to my good host and his lady, and we all entered the house. The Captain was the first San Francisco friend that I had seen since I had left Denmison on that dreadful sixth of July, in Santa Barbara, and I could scarcely control my joy. Supper was immediately prepared for him, and I soon became absorbed in the contents of the letters he had brought me. Among them was the following from the Hon. E. T. Beatty, then speaker of the House of Assembly:

"Sacramento City, Jan'y 27, 1857.

Judge Edward McGowan:

Dear Sir:—I have had much conversation with Capt. Reese and others in regard to the practicability of having a special act passed by the present Legislature granting you a change of venue from San Francisco without the necessity of your personal appearance in that county; and am of opinion that there will be no difficulty in accomplishing it. It is so notorious that your person would be in danger of mob violence were you to go back there, to say nothing of the absolute impossibility of your procuring a fair trial in that community, that I cannot conceive of any honest man's opposition to a law so obviously just and necessary. I would therefore recommend to you by all means to come as quietly and quickly as you can to Sacramento, where you certainly will be at least safe from personal violence.

Very truly your friend,
(Signed) E. T. BEATTY

This, together with some other letters which I received from friends in San Francisco, at once resolved me as to my course. I determined to go to Sacramento at all hazards, and trust to the sense of justice of the members of the Legislature to be put in a condition honorably to stand my trial without the danger of falling a victim to the fanaticism of the San Francisco mob.

My friend Reese had a plan to purchase or charter a schooner at San Francisco, and take her, with me in her, directly from Santa Barbara to Sacramento. This arrangement, however, was not satisfactory for the reason that everything depended on my arriving at the capital before the Legislature adjourned, and the time necessary to procure the vessel and send her down the coast, and make the passage back with her to Sacramento, making due allowance for calms and head winds, was likely to exceed the time which the Legislature would probably be in session, the Senate having already resolved to adjourn on the fourth of March. Accordingly, after consultation with the Doctor I made up my mind to start immediately for Sacramento by land, avoiding San Francisco and going by the "Pacheco Pass," to Stockton and thence to the capital. The Doctor and Reese and myself sat up late that night talking over the events of the past ten months in San Francisco, and discussing my future plans of action, occasionally indulging in potations of my host's good brandy; and when I retired that night, I felt really a sense of sadness that with the termination of my misfortunes would also terminate my delightful intercourse with my generous friend and his family. So kind had the Doctor and Donna Rosa been to me, that I felt somewhat of the regret of the "Prisoner of Chillon," when the hour of his release from captivity approached. Not, however, like him, from excess of despair, and long familiarity with misery, but from the reflection that my return to the haunts of my fellow men, earnestly as I longed for it, was bought at the sacrifice of those delightful pleasures which only he can know who has been the recipient, in the hour of his adversity, of the spontaneous and heart gushing benevolence of one of nature's noblemen

Among the recent purchasers of Haynes cars is the Reno Grocer Company, one of the largest wholesale concerns in Reno, Nevada. This car was bought because of the purchaser's belief in its endurance and ability to travel hard roads and assimilate rough usage. It is to be used by the company's salesmen and is to travel the route from Paisley, Ore., on the north to beyond Woodford in Southern California. This is a specially hard course, much of it not being at all designed for automobiling and to make it on a single tour is considered no mean achievement. The Haynes, however, will have to be a regular on the route.

Discussing his recent Eastern visit Clyde C. Kennedy, secretary of the Consolidated Vehicle Company, said: "While East I visited a number of big automobile factories and everywhere was the same story of marvelous demand for this season's cars. There can be no doubt about McFarlan's popularity in the East. The factory at Connersville, Indiana, was as busy as any that I visited and even by working night and day was finding it impossible to catch up with orders. There is an unmistakable tendency in the East toward the six-cylinder car and I believe that the necessity of successful competition will force a large number of the machines now using fewer cylinders to adopt this construction. The McFarlan factory has recently put several of their cars through very severe tests and in every case they have made good. At the time of the Indianapolis auto show a McFarlan made the run from Columbus to Indianapolis, a distance of 185 miles, without a shift of gear. This was merely a trial spin. An idea of the call for McFarlans is given by an instance that occurred while I was at the factory. A dealer from the West came to secure, if possible, an additional allotment of 1910 cars and offered to pay the whole purchase price in spot cash."

W. F. Whittier and Herbert Levy are the most recent car owners to equip with Morgan & Wright Nobby Tread Tires. Levy drives a Locomobile noted for its elegance and the Nobbies add much to its attractiveness.

Geo. Schelling of Santa Rosa has placed his second order with the Standard Motor Car Co. for a carload of machines since taking the agency in that territory. Schelling reports a big demand throughout the northern section of the State for high class motor cars.

Calvin C. Eib, vice-president of the Pioneer Automobile Co., had as his guests on the opening day of the Shriners' race meet Messrs. Wagner and Warner, starter and timekeeper of the races. Both these gentlemen are very fond of the Lozier car.

Among the record-breaking distributions of automobiles are the achievements of some of the Overland agencies this year. The New York agency sold 1200 cars and was forced to refuse further orders because of depleted allotment. The house in Atlanta, Ga., after having sold 1000 cars put in a call for as many more, while the Dallas, Texas, agency has actually placed every car of a 2000 allotment and is now taking advance orders for 1911 models. The Overland is wonderfully popular in Texas and is much used on the Texas ranges. Its size, mechanical simplicity and ability to negotiate rough going have made it the favorite car among the cattle men.

Ivan deJongh, manager of the Standard Motor Car Company, reports that C. R. Allen has been appointed Oakland agent for Ford cars and has ordered, for immediate delivery, ten of these well known machines. With headquarters at Nineteenth and Broadway the news trans-bay automobile representative will have one of the most central salesrooms in Oakland and will have the facilities for carrying a complete line of Ford cars. Allen will make a feature of the Ford coupe, believing that the level condition of Oakland streets offers a fine opportunity for users of the car in that city.

According to a letter received by The Diamond Rubber Co. Mr. W. J. Newmark of San Mateo has had splendid service from Diamond tires on his Pierce Arrow car. He writes that the front tires have given over 9,000 miles while the rears have covered in the neighborhood of 7,000 up to date.

H. E. Doty, Pacific Coast manager of the White Co., is just in receipt of the following letter from M. McComas of Dallas, Texas, showing the efficiency and simplicity of the White steam car as a kerosene burner:

"I never saw kerosene used before but had no trouble firing up the first time I used it and the only difference I could notice was that I imagined it more effective than gasoline. I am certainly delighted with the Model-O-O and kerosene. We encountered some very heavy rough and rocky roads between Ganesville and Denison and though the car had never been fired up since it left the factory, there was not a moment's delay. The man who bought the car, E. C. Sturgis, and also T. L. Clark, the superintendent of the cotton mills here, who is waiting for the other car which I have ordered, accompanied me in the new O-O. Mr. Sturgis had never touched the steering wheel of an automobile before that day and he ran the steamer for the six miles from Sherman to Denison upon his first attempt without difficulty. Since that initial experience he has taken his family out three times, in each case running the car entirely by himself. The White Company is very modest in its claims about kerosene as a fuel. I fail to see where it takes any longer to get a car ready with kerosene than with gasoline I got the new Model O-O ready in 8 minutes."

SUMMONS TO ESTABLISH TITLE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—Action No. 21,163, Department No. 10.

ANNIE E. REYNOLDS, sometimes known as MRS. G. F. REYNOLDS, Plaintiff, vs.

All Persons Claiming Any Interest in, or Lien Upon, the Real Property Herein Described, or Any Part Thereof, Defendants.

The People of the State of California: To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of ANNIE E. REYNOLDS, sometimes known as MRS. G. F. REYNOLDS, plaintiff, filed with the clerk of the above entitled Court and City and County, within three (3) months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

PARCEL No. 2.—Commencing at a point on the Southerly line of Twenty-sixth (26th) Street, distant thereon One Hundred and Eighty-nine (189) feet Westerly from the Westerly line of Dolores Street, and running thence Westerly on said Southerly line of Twenty-sixth (26th) Street Twenty-five (25) feet; thence at a right angle Southerly One Hundred and Fourteen (114) feet; thence at a right angle Easterly Twenty-five (25) feet, and thence at a right angle Northerly One Hundred and Fourteen (114) feet to the point of beginning. Being a portion of Horner's Addition Block 59.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that the plaintiff is the owner of said property in fee simple absolute; that her title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consist of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiff recover her costs herein and have such other relief as may be meet in the premises.

SUMMONS TO ESTABLISH TITLE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—Action No. 21,253.

DORA I. WALTON, Plaintiff, vs.
All Persons Claiming any Interest in, or Lien Upon, the Real Property Herein Described, or any Part Thereof, Defendants.

Action in rem brought against all the world in the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and the complaint filed in said City and County in the office of the Clerk of said Superior Court.

The People of the State of California: To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described, or any part thereof, defendants, Greeting.

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Dora I. Walton, the above-named plaintiff, filed with the Clerk of the above entitled Court and County, within three months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property, or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

Commencing at a point on the Easterly line of Douglas Street, distant thereon One Hundred and Fifteen (115) feet Northerly from the Northerly line of Twenty-third Street; running thence Northerly along the said Easterly line of Douglas Street Fifty (50) feet; thence at right angles Easterly One Hundred and Thirty-four (134) feet and Three (3) inches; thence at right angles Southerly Fifty (50) feet, and thence at right angles Westerly One Hundred and Thirty-four (134) feet and Three (3) inches to the point of commencement. Portion of Horner's Addition Block Number Two Hundred and Sixteen (216).

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: The judgment of this Court establishing plaintiff's title to said real property and determining all adverse claims thereto, and declaring plaintiff to be the owner in fee simple absolute of all the above described real property and each and every part thereof free and clear of any liens or encumbrances, and for general relief and costs of suit.

Witness my hand and the Seal of said Court this 28th day of April, A. D. 1910. H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE WHY ORDER OF SALE OF REAL ESTATE SHOULD NOT BE MADE

In the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California—No. 9369, Dept. 10.

In the Matter of the Estate of EDWIN WALLACE CARPENTER, Deceased.

MAX THELEN, the Administrator with the Will Annexed of the Estate of Edwin Wallace Carpenter, deceased, having presented to this Court and filed herein his verified petition praying for an order for the sale of all the real property of the above named decedent, for the purposes therein set forth; and it appearing to this Court that it is for the advantage, benefit, and best interests of the said estate and those interested therein that the whole of the real estate belonging to the said estate be sold, and that it is necessary to sell the whole of the real estate of the said decedent in order to pay the expenses and charges of administration;

It is therefore ordered that all persons interested in the estate of the said deceased appear before this Court on Tuesday, the 31st day of May, 1910, at the Courtroom of Department 10 thereof, in the Grant Building, at the corner of Seventh and Market Streets, in the City and County of San Francisco, then and there to show cause, if any they have, why an order should not be granted to said Administrator with the Will Annexed to sell the whole of the real estate belonging to the said deceased, at either private or public sale as he shall judge to be most beneficial for the said estate.

It is further ordered that a copy of this Order be published once a week for four successive weeks in "Town Talk," a newspaper of general circulation printed and published in the City and County of San Francisco.

Dated, the 21st day of April, 1910.

"The Girl from His Town"

"The Girl from His Town" jumps us from a Montana mining camp to a London theater, with an intermediate stop at an English country house and a final whirl in Paris. Dan Blair is the hero, if one can admit anything particularly heroic about a youth who has done nothing save inherit fifty million dollars, let himself be made a fool of by an impecunious duchess a good many years older than himself and finally settle down to bliss and blessedness with the girl who sold soda water in the drug store at Blairtown when he was a kid but who, meanwhile, has become the most successful musical comedy actress in London and is in the pleasant habit of sacrificing pearl necklaces and diamond ornaments in order to hand uncounted "wads" to the blind beggars and starving street brats who have the entree of her dressing rooms. Dan Blair is too unbelievably good to be natural. His father is credited with having brought him up wholesomely and given him plenty of common sense advice. There's nothing remarkable about that, but the wonderful thing is that the boy is represented as having heeded it. He even attended college in California without learning anything not prescribed in the books, so that when, at twenty-two, he became master of himself and his millions, he was neither a spendthrift nor altogether a fool though it is utterly impossible to believe him altogether such an innocent. Dan's father, in his less prosperous days, had acted as guide for a game-hunting Englishman and, taking a liking to his employer, there had been a loose agreement between them that some day the boy was to go to the Galoreys, and he, taking the promise literally, dropped down on them without warning. Galorey himself wasn't so bad—nor so very good, either, but it was not long before Lady Galorey was wheedling checks out of the young American for her charities which, like so much of that commodity, began at home and stayed there. Her friend and visitor, the impecunious Duchess of Breakwater, fell very much in love with Dan's fifty millions, and it was not long before she had annexed both him and them temporarily. It was a slight indiscretion on her part which prevented the annexation from being permanent, or at least long enough to entitle her to alimony. Meanwhile the Galorey party had taken Dan to the theater where, in Letty Lind, the star of the piece, he recognized his old acquaintance, the soda fountain girl, likewise his senior. Dan wasn't going to fall in love with Letty, but he did, all the same, and it was through his efforts to have his Duchess of Breakwater take her up that his other love affair came a cropper, after he had presented the delectable duchess with some fine jewels and checks large enough to pay for the restoration of her castle. Dan Blair has a quasi guardian, an old partner of his father's, who comes to London partly on business, partly to see what the lad is up to, and one likes Galorey all the better for the straight forward talk in which he tells Ruggles, without mincing words, just what sort of a nest the youth has dropped into. Ruggles, of course, sets to work to extricate him from the mess, and if he were successful there would be little story left to tell. Letty Lind, otherwise Sally Towney, who, despite her lavish and unconsidered gifts to the poor, has been living the life of her class, has really fallen in love with the little boy who used to do his best to ruin his digestion with chocolate soda in order to gaze on her blonde bangs, but she is willing to sacrifice herself and him and marry the Hungarian count who has been her best friend hitherto, rather than deprive Dan of the fortune which, it appears, is not his at all, but all the property of Ruggles, through some flaw in the title. If Letty will give up Dan, Ruggles will not say a word, but otherwise, they will have to face a cold, cold world penniless. Letty tries the stunt but it will not work. She flees to Paris with Dan after her, and after one wild night in which he makes a few tentative steps on the road "to the devil," and has a nightmare dream of a duel and death to the strains of his Letty's voice singing the old missionary hymn, "From Greenland's Icy Mountains," he makes an early morning call on his lady love when she prattles sweetly of being together night and day, and learing to cook and sew and watch the sunsets from their humble shack, and it's all very idylic and beautiful, but does any one imagine it would last? Any way, the story of the beautiful actress weeping for the lost joys of sock-darning has a reminiscent and a mirth provoking cadence hereabouts, and as the last line of the last chapter leaves the blissful pair still making plans, there's yet time for them to change their minds. However, there's much to be thankful for. A few years ago the author, Marie Van Vorst, made a personal study of conditions in the cotton mills of the south, and instead of writing an agreeable if not particularly convincing romance, she might have palmed off a child-labor tract upon us. The Best Wives

According to Prof. William Thomas of the University of Chicago, country girls make the best wives.

Professor Thomas calls city girls artificial beauties and points to the professional beauty specialists who make a living "doctoring" faces as proof.

"Luxury is the barrier to the matrimonial young men and women of the cities," he declares. "Matrimony to the well-to-do must mean luxury, and the average young man does not want to assume that contract."

"Girls, study your country sisters. Stop this everlasting fashion of stroking a shaggy poodle and wasting time on Teddy bears and the marriageable men will have more time for you. Go out into the country. Live the life of your country sisters, and the bloom of health will come to your cheeks without the aid of cosmetics."

The Fadless Barrymore

A New York newspaper woman who, after much arranging, obtained the difficult entree to Miss Barrymore's dressing room between the acts of "Mid-Channel," began her interview thus: "Now, Miss Barrymore, please tell me all your fads."

"But I haven't any," said Miss Barrymore sweetly. "I care about my family, my friends and my work. Nothing else interests me very much in a personal sense. I don't care to collect things, I don't care to own bric-a-brac, or rare postage stamps, or rugs. Everything about the stage interests me enormously. It always has. Knowing the stage and stage things, for the actor, is much the same as the musician knowing his instrument. A pianist must be interested in pianos if he is going to rise above the level of the average. If you would call the stage a fad, then I have one, but I am afraid that is too obvious a fact to be a discovery." "I am afraid so," said the reporter sadly, and she went away with dashed hopes for she thought that all actresses must have curious tastes

PREMIER

What Does It Mean to You?

What does it mean to you that more than 84 per cent of the people who have purchased PREMIER cars during the past three years are still driving PREMIER cars?

What does it mean to you that PREMIER cars are conspicuous by their absence from "Second-hand for Sale" lists?

It does mean that PREMIER records gained in reliability contests are supported by equally consistent and satisfactory service in the hands of the users.

It does mean that PREMIER owners do not try to dispose of their cars—they last for years.

The PREMIER Car of today is a development; not a Chance Happening.

PREMIER design in detail represents the most approved practices, which means that PREMIER construction throughout is in line with the ideas and principles which experimentation has shown the most able engineers of Europe and America to be BEST. They are ideas which stood the acid test of experience when best features were sought. Those unable to measure up were eliminated. Compare any feature of the PREMIIER with the corresponding feature or part in the best regarded makes in Europe or America and you will find that the practices which PREMIER Makers consider commonplace, because they are only in keeping with the other PREMIER features, are pointed out by other makers as representing the earmarks of quality.

There are no special talking points in PREMIER cars. Every feature in the PREMIER is a talking point, because it represents best practice and its use is supported by reasons which have been tried and proven correct.

H-O

Your Forefathers Ate It

Our sturdy pioneers gained strength and muscle from a diet of oatmeal porridge. To hew down the forests—to build up homes—to conquer the soil—to lay the corner stone for the foundation of our present prosperity—all required good, substantial food. Their out-door, active life gave them power to digest the ordinary Rolled Oats.

But that was long ago. Today, indoor life and sedentary habits have compelled the people to seek a food capable of being assimilated with the least severe tax on the digestive organs. Our patented steam-cooking process acts directly on the starchy element of the oats and makes them thoroughly digestible. Fifteen minutes' boiling is all that is required to prepare H-O oatmeal for the table.

Use H-O oatmeal for a few mornings and be convinced of its goodness.

Do not confuse H-O oatmeal with the ordinary raw oats sold under the name of "Rolled Oats" or "Crushed Oats." H-O oatmeal is never sold in bulk; it is free from dirt, germs and all impurities.

H-O oatmeal is manufactured from the highest grade of selected stock. After removing all foreign matter, the meat of the oat is subjected to a very high temperature, and by our own patented process is cooked for several hours under heavy steam pressure. This steam-cooking dextrinizes the starch and renders the oats easily digestible.

H-O oatmeal is ready for the breakfast table after from ten to fifteen minutes' boiling, and provides an inviting dish of sweet, clean, separate, tender kernels in place of the sticky, soggy, indigestible mass obtained in cooking the usual "Rolled Oats." Possibly the "other" kind may be cheaper; but as soon as you have tested and appreciated the quality of H-O oatmeal, you will gladly pay the few cents difference.

Another Victory

A great and wonderful victory was achieved by this glorious and credulous city last week. So the Hon. Percy V. Long informs us, and the Examiner transported with joy on receipt of the glad news gives expression to its emotion in editorial and pictorial rhapsodies. Mr. Long produced an almost unprecedented orgasm in the Examiner office. And doubtless the Examiner infected its readers with its ecstasy. Yet the victory, though pronounced "a substantial victory" by Mr. Long, is hardly the kind of victory to appeal to the imagination of the public. It is quite devoid of the romantic element. Its appeal is to the intellect, not to the heart. To be appreciated it must be analyzed, and consequently it neither inflames nor induces hysteria. The process of analysis is chilling. Gratifying as it may be to be told that we have been allowed a year's time in which to gather data and file a brief in support of our application for permission to make the Hetch-Hetchy Valley part of a municipal water system, the news is productive of nothing like spontaneous enthusiasm except in emotional newspaper offices. It does not make the serene, prosaic citizen boisterous, nor is the sensation that it produces conducive to the hilarity that is symbolized by the throwing of hats in the air and the lifting of voices to the empyrean. Aside from the uninspiriting character of all purely civic victories this Hetch-Hetchy victory is necessarily in the nature of a frost because it is merely supplementary to a whole string of similar triumphs which have been contrived from time to time for the titillation of our emotions. As a matter of fact these Hetch-Hetchy triumphs are beginning to get on our nerves and give us pause. By this last one some citizens have been plunged into sombre meditation. They are asking themselves why it is that the Hon. Percy Long and the Hon. Marsden Manson require a year's time in which to make out a case. These eminent public servants have been immersed in the Hetch-Hetchy problem for several years. The supposition was that they had mastered all its intricacies, impounded all available data. It was understood that they had reached a point where nothing was to be done but to issue bonds, get the money and build the system. But when called upon to enlighten the Federal authorities, to show that we really need the Hetch-Hetchy Valley, they ask for time in which to make out a case. The courtesy is extended, and at once they attitudinize and point with pride to the happy consummation. A great and wonderful victory, indeed! It affords us an insight into the consummate ability available for carrying out the darling scheme of municipal ownership.

The Fight and the Clergy

Thus far the great outcry of the clergy against the Jeffries-Johnson fight has had no perceptible effect on the public mind. The men by whom this barbarity is to be perpetrated are attending to business as though they were quite oblivious of the opposition that has been organized by the guardians of public virtue. The ungrateful press which makes use of the pliant pulpit whenever yellow journalism is in the mood to pull off a spasm of morality is giving no aid or encouragement to its handmaiden. The pulpit is leading a forlorn hope singlehanded and alone. Nay, yellow journalism instead of thundering against the impending iniquity is actually glorifying the objects of clerical objurgation and frankly celebrating the coming event despite the vehement demands of churchmen to save the people from its demoralizing and brutalizing effects. The situation is doubtless deplorable; not, however, in our opinion, because two burly, beetle-browed bruisers are to be permitted to batter each other for the gratification of a depraved mob infatuated with the beauty of blood and the poetry of uppercuts, but rather because it seems to imply the impotency of the pulpit as a moral agent. The pathetic situation is terribly humiliating to the clergy. The representatives of at least half a dozen of the jarring sects united in a mighty effort to rouse public sentiment against the fight, and they haven't evoked so much as the tribute of an echo. Nobody is paying any attention to them. The only discussions that are heard are with reference to the physical condition of the distinguished pluguglies. The vociferations of the clergy are drowned in the clamor for news from Rowardennan, where the champion of the white race is being sweated down to weight in interviews with the obsequious correspondents of an enlightened and enlightening press. So widespread, so pervasive and penetrating is the morbid obsession that even we find ourselves indifferent to the clerical protest and inclined to argue that pugilism is a science that preserves one of the most beautiful of the primitive virtues, the virtue of physical courage. At the same time we feel that the conspicuous futility of the clerical protest is to be deplored. Public indifference in this matter is evidence of the waning of pulpit prestige and influence. It appears that as one of the spiritual motors of the time the pulpit is becoming all but powerless. When we consider the number of sermons preached in our churches every year there is presented to the mind the idea of a vast spiritual instrument of immeasurable potentialities. Yet we are amazed at how little the pulpit is doing toward furthering religious and moral life. In the confusion of polemical strife in ecclesiastical courts occasioned by clamor for new creeds and the casting off of old ones the preachers make a tremendous uproar and provoke the laity to cynicism and scepticism, but in their too frequently misguided efforts to give tone and character to society their voice is hardly heard above the clatter of the world's discords.

Cromer's Downfall

Governor Cromer of Alabama is nearing the end of his term, and the people are much pleased. Governor Cromer is a shattered popular idol. His career presents a fine object lesson for those who would study the ways of the reformer and the psychology of popular enthusiasm. His case abounds in universal characteristics. He is a typical American reformer, a perfect specimen of the printing press hero. He would be easily susceptible of dramatization for the purpose of illustrating the credulity of the people, of exemplifying the saying of Carlyle that popular opinion is the greatest lie in the world, as well as the observation of Montaigne that the vulgar and common esteem is seldom happy in hitting right. A few years ago Cromer was the most popular man in Alabama. He attained popularity in the usual way—by expressing his sympathy with the prejudices and absurdities of the moment. His fulminations against wicked persons in general were accepted as proof of his superior virtue and his enthusiasm for righteousness. Everybody that disagreed with Cromer was suspected of being a tool of the machine, and vituperated accordingly. Now Cromer has been found out. Alabama has twice repudiated him. The people have demanded better treatment for capital, and Cromer is an abandoned as well as a despised demagogue. He that builded on the vulgar heart has found that it is a giddy and insecure habitation.

Hinman Found Out

Along with the downfall of Cromer should be chronicled also the unpedestaling of the Hon. Harvey D. Hinman of New York. Reform and Hinman have been synonymous terms for several years. Hinman has been the hero of many contests for civic redemption, he has led many a forlorn hope of righteousness. Like Cromer, indeed, like all contemporary zealots of reform and connoisseurs of public pap he won the affections of the people by artful propagation of the impression that he was holier than his neighbor. This impression he contrived by means of wholesale denunciation. Among artisans in the trade of defamation he was recognized as a journeyman of the first rank. Few men were better equipped with the vocabulary of personal abuse. Many a heart was seared and burned with the verbal vitriol which he poured out in the course of his glorious career as a reviler of his fellow man. But Hinman's bag of venom has been punctured. In the State Senate of New York the other day he denounced his associates with all his accustomed fervor. He pronounced them "weaklings and crooks" for amending a resolution for a general investigation of something that was regarded with suspicion. Then rose one of the "weaklings and crooks" and exhibited a sheet of paper in the handwriting of Senator Hinman. It was an amendment protecting from legislative investigation the industrial insurance companies. Now as Senator Hinman is the attorney of an insurance company he realized the urgency of an explanation and the reiteration of his passionate devotion to the cause of righteousness. But only grim silence greeted his words. He sat down conscious of the collapse of his brilliant career. And the gallery smiled. When a reformer who has lived off the destruction of other men's reputation reaches the point where he has to plead extenuating circumstances in his own defense; where he must dodge, not strike; where he becomes the target of those who are better than raw hands with the weapons which were once his alone—when the habitual reviler finds himself in this tragic predicament, there is none so generous as to pay him the tribute of a tear.

The Imperishable Type

Cromer and Hinman have been found out. The people are disgusted with them, but their type persists and fluourishes. The credulity of the people is inexhaustible. To the blandishments of pharisaism they are eternally susceptible. This is perhaps according to a wise provision of nature ordained for the purpose of safeguarding them against the evils of complaisance and constancy. If the people were too wise to be fooled by demagogues they would suffer themselves to be enslaved by practical politicians. The world is a scene of changes, and it is by the constant change in human affairs that we progress. The blatant demagogue who rouses us from apathy, making us dissatisfied and therefore preventing stagnation is a public benefactor. Though his personality is usually offensive to persons possessed of more than the average of worldly knowledge and a practical acquaintance with men and things, yet it must be admitted that he is as much an agency of God as the vulture and the rodent. He has sheathed within him a spiritual truth like every material fact in the vast symbolism of nature. Nevertheless it ought not to be considered to one's discredit to contemn the self-seeking reformer. What is repugnant to our senses it is human nature to abhor even though it be a necessary evil. The skunk is one of the mysterious means employed by an inscrutable Providence its wonders to perform, but it is not to be embraced as a mark of appreciation.

Millikan's Discovery

Professor Millikan of Chicago who has succeeded in isolating an ion of electricity is credited with having made a most important discovery. Perhaps he has taken another stride toward that final goal which is still so far away—the answer to the question, What is electricity? At any rate Professor Millikan is doing the kind of work that is recognized as the most powerful agent of civilization and human progress. His discovery has already been decried; which is what usually happens when a man of science brings a new truth to light in the course of experimental work. His discovery may appear to be insignificant, but in all sciences vast fields of exploration have been opened up by what once appeared to be trivial phenomena. According to a popular fallacy nearly all important discoveries have been the result of accident. It is true that many phenomena fraught with the most momentous consequences have been accidentally discovered; that is they were not produced with premeditation, but in most instances they were the result of scientific experiment. There have been exceptions of course, as for example the discovery of the apparently insignificant property possessed by amber of attracting feathers after it has been rubbed. This was known six hundred years before the Christian era, but it was scientific study of this property that led in modern times to the discovery of electricity. It can be said of Galvani that he might never have discovered the electric current had it not been for the unexpected contraction of a frog's legs. But it was as a result of his experiments that the phenomenon was produced. Even the steam engine was partly the result of researches by scientists. Watt himself stated in his pamphlet entitled "A Plain Story" that he could not have perfected his engine had not Dr. Black and others ascertained what amount of heat was rendered latent by the conversion of water into steam. It was by scientific research that Franklin found that lightning and electricity were identical, the consequence being the use of the lightning conductor and all the inventions foreshadowed by the discovery that electricity would pass freely through metals. It was Newton's discovery of the decomposition of light by means of a prism that led to the invention of the spectroscope. Pasteur revolutionized the practice of medicine after learning by experiment of the fermentative powers of yeast. All the great inventions of modern times were made through the application of principles discovered by science to the substances and forces by which we are surrounded. The history of modern civilization teaches us that in all the branches of science the most momentous discoveries have been made by such men as Millikan of Chicago who spent their lives in experimental investigation, searching for new truths that they might in adding to the store of human knowledge either mitigate the miseries or augment the blessings of mankind.

The New Sea Song of the Greedy Lascar

Now some men swim and some men drown,
And a ship she cleared from Glasgow town,
And over the bar steamed she,
With her siren hooting balefully,
Into the fog on the Irish Sea.
And on her deck was an Englishman,
A Briton drunk and free.
And down in her hold where the great fires be
And the engines thunder sullenly,
A sober man, sweating in slavery:
A Lascar man.
Down in the hold was a Lascar man
Sweating in slavery.

Now the mercy of God in the fog ran down
The ship that cleared from Glasgow town:
Down in the deep went she,
With her plates a-gaping woundily,
And her fires all drowned in the Irish Sea.
And over her side leaped the Englishman,
Naked as born to be.
"I thank my God I'm alive," said he;
"I thank my God for His mercy to me,
And never more I'll follow the sea,"
Said the Englishman.
Safe ashore was the Englishman,
And drunk as drunk could be.

And yet in the hold of the ship gone down
The sober Lascar chose to drown—
Drown though his choice was free.
But first he dropped on his bended knee
And hugged his poor little treasury.
And thus to his God prayed the Lascar man:
"Leave the wage of my toil to me,
And I'll thank Thee God most joyously—
I'll thank thee, God, from the deep of the sea
That I walk not the earth in poverty,"
Said the Lascar man.
And down in the depth went the Lascar man
With the wage of his toil in the sea.

Now that Lascar man I would rather be
And take my ease on the floor of the sea
And share with a mermaid my last rupee
Than walk this land of liberty
In misery.

—Norreys Connell.

Perspective Impressions

Helen Emery Aoki ought to be permitted to repent in obscurity.

President Wheeler has gone to Europe to become a member of Colonel Roosevelt's "Back from Elba" entourage. Even a little reflected glory is soothing to the soul of Berkeley's first citizen.

Mr. Roosevelt's admirers are now measuring his popularity by the number of applications that were made for permission to participate in the home-coming parade. Not a very good standard of measurement. The passion for parade is universal.

Some of our university students are going to work in a logging camp this summer to earn money with which to defray their expenses at college. This is much better than working as bell-boys at summer resorts and taking tips for expense money.

The Hon. Theodore Bell heaved a sonorous sigh of relief when M. F. Tarpey decided not to run for Governor. But Theodore is not yet out of the woods. The proverbial yellow dog may be found for the emergency.

At the primary election in Indianapolis last week less than forty per cent of the vote of each party was cast, though the people had the opportunity of casting a direct vote for United States Senator. And yet we are told that the people really want to rule.

According to the muckrakers it doesn't matter what the joint Ballinger-Pinchot investigating committee reports since Ballinger stands convicted before the bar of public opinion. Quite right. The people always believe what the muckrakers tell them. So even though the minority report should acquit Ballinger of wrongdoing, as it is likely to do, the Secretary must consider himself an unstriped convict.

Ned McGowan's Narrative

(This serial account of the adventures of a fugitive from the vengeance of the Vigilance Committee begins with the history of the circumstances that led to the organization of that so-called law and order body. McGowan has told us of his escape from San Francisco, of his flight to Santa Barbara and of the many romantic episodes that marked his career during the months he was in hiding. All the while the Vigilance Committee kept up a search for him, and he was assured of being hanged if captured. In the seventh instalment the reader accompanies him to the home of Dr. Nicholas A. Den where he was given protection, and where he remained until, as we learn in the eighth instalment, his friends arranged for a journey to Sacramento where the legislature was in session—Editor's Note)

(Ninth Instalment)

My friend the Captain, on being apprised of my determination to return north by land, instantly declared his intention of accompanying me. This proof of his friendship, though not unexpected, was greater than I was willing to accept. I expostulated with him on his folly in incurring the dangers and discomforts of such a trip at that season of the year, assuring him that I could make my way through alone; but all to no purpose. He only replied that he had come to me to help me out of my misfortunes, and did not intend to leave me until he had seen me safely through. Accordingly it was arranged that we should start together, and the next morning the Doctor, sending Reese's hired horse back by an Indian, drove him to town in his buggy, where it was necessary he should go in order to provide himself with equipments for his journey. I gave him a note to an Irish gentleman of the name of F. J. Maguire, Esq., who I thought would be a proper person to assist him in making his arrangements.

I forgot to mention that I had made the acquaintance of this gentleman during my stay at the Dos Pueblos. He was a frequent visitor there, and a very clever and intelligent man. He was one of the patriots who were driven from Ireland by the tyranny of their rulers, and is very respectably connected at home. His brother is a member of the British Parliament, and editor of the Cork Examiner, one of the ablest presses of the kingdom. Although for a year past he has been at perfect liberty to return to his native land under shelter of the bill of amnesty passed by Parliament in behalf of the expatriated Irishmen, he prefers to remain under the wings of our Eagle, and has permanently located upon the soil, having married a California lady, a sister of the wife of Captain Thomas Moore, of Sal si Puedes. He was originally educated to the bar, but has abandoned his profession, preferring to engage in mercantile pursuits. He is a gentleman of fine attainments and will doubtless ere long take a distinguished position among the citizens of his county. To this gentleman, who keeps a store in Santa Barbara, I commended my friend Reese.

The Captain was received very kindly, not only by Mr. Maguire, but also many others of my friends in Santa Barbara. He was introduced to the Mayor, Don Antonio Maria De la Guerra, who gave him a letter to one of his brothers at Los Alamos, a place we were to pass on our journey north; also one to a nephew of his at San Luis Obispo. In short, the Captain was so kindly treated, and liked Santa Barbara so well that he did not get back to the Dos Pueblos until Thursday night.

Being a little superstitious about starting on a Friday, it was arranged that on Saturday morning we should bid adieu to the hospitable roof of my protector. I was not sorry for this respite, for I knew I should feel many a pang at parting with the Doctor's little children, who were very much attached to Paisano as they called me, and I really loved them; particularly my little favorite, Alphonso. I knew that he would miss me, for I was always the confidant of his little childish sorrows; and he would have no one to go with him into the mountains, and carry him over the brooks, and make little boats and shoot quail for him. Then, too, there was smiling little Nicolas, Guillermo, and Alfredo who used to run to Paisano every morning to get him to help them hunt the new laid eggs. Poor little innocents! may they never be scathed by the Sirocco breath which first introduced them to their wandering friend.

At length the hour of parting came. On Saturday morning, the 14th day of February, everything was got in readiness for the start. It was a wild and wintry day, but time was everything to me, and start I must. Two of the Doctor's finest horses for our relays had been in some time, resting for the journey, and a guide had been provided whose name was Jose Lopez. He was to accompany us the first three hundred miles. In case of trouble from arrest on the road, I was provided by the Doctor with a letter to the District Judge, Don Joaquin Carrillo, who was then in San Luis Obispo, which would, as far as his authority was concerned, have insured me at least fair play. We were also to be accompanied on our first day's journey to the Mission of Santa Inez by the Rev. Father F. C. Rubio, who was chief in control at the Mission, and was at that time on a visit to Doctor Den. The good Padre made a short prayer for our safe return to our friends and my speedy deliverance from all my troubles, and we were then ready.

I kissed each of the little children, and shook Donna Rosa warmly by the hand. I then shook hands with all the servants, and presented to "Juan de Dios" a little mare which was unfit for the journey. I had bought her some three months before from a German, for the sake of the saddle and bridle that were on her. The Doctor and I then walked to the gate, and I must confess that I could not keep back the tears which were streaming down my face. The rest of the party had started, and as I was about to mount, I desired to express to Doctor Den my appreciation of his great goodness, and the everlasting debt of gratitude I owed him, but my heart was too full and the words stuck in my throat—all that was in me of my mother gained the ascendancy, and I could not articulate. The Doctor bade me desist, and told me he wanted no thanks. He then in a few words gave me some good advice about my future course in life, and murmuring "God bless you!" I waved my hand to him and his, and rode after my companions who were already some hundreds of yards on the road.

The Father Rubio appeared to have taken quite a liking to my friend Reese. He had ascertained that he was a Catholic, and being himself from old Spain, he thought it was a rare thing to find one of his own religion among the Americans. We cantered on as comfortably as we could in such weather, smoking our cigars, and chatting with the old Padre, and without anything of interest occurring, commenced about twelve o'clock noon to cross the mountain of Santa Inez. It was raining very hard and the trail, bad enough in the dry season, was now rendered very slippery and in some places dangerous. The crossing occupied about two hours, and was very trying on our animals. The Father and myself rode the entire distance, but no gibes or coaxing could induce the Captain to venture it. And indeed I do not blame him. To any one unaccustomed to such traveling it seemed fool-hardy in the extreme to risk one's neck on such a road. I had ridden it once before at night, and, considering that I ought, after that, to be willing to try it by day-light, I would not dismount; though I confess, at times, I felt by no means certain of safely reaching the other side. Reese frequently walked and led his horse until we reached the plain on the other side. We ar-

The Longing

By Emil Davies

The accident was as bad as it was sudden; the doctor had just told him that he had about twenty-four hours to live. At first he felt stunned, but then, resolutely facing the situation, as he had so often done in business matters (of what minor importance they suddenly seemed in a moment like this!) he mapped out his twenty-four hours. His affairs were in good order, he was heavily insured, so that his wife and children were sufficiently well provided for. He wondered if the doctor had told his wife.

The thought that he would not see his two children grow up caused him a moment's anguish; and there was his wife! But he felt there was no time to be lost in vain regrets, and these thoughts, too, he put resolutely from him.

Suddenly a mad longing seized him, an overpowering desire. He must at all cost bid farewell not only to his wife, but to the other two women who had played a part in his life; the problem was how to do it in the few hours allotted him without compromising either of the women or wounding the feelings of his wife; and the time was short.

In the case of Enid, his wife's cousin, it was easy enough; from the earliest days of his acquaintance with his wife, he had been brought into such close contact with her cousin and later on with the husband that there would be nothing out of the way in his wishing to see her; moreover—and he smiled somewhat bitterly at the reflection—their relationship had not been such that he need in any way hesitate to make what was, after all, a perfectly natural request. As regards the other woman, who had played a more intimate part in his life, it was a little more awkward; true, she was one of his wife's friends, and she and her husband were frequent visitors; but the relationship—at any rate, so far as the world was concerned—was not of a sufficiently close nature to justify such a request.

The brain of the dying man worked rapidly, and in a few minutes he had evolved his scheme; at the worst it could be regarded as the whim of a man who knew he had only a few hours to live. He would ask to have a few minutes with half a dozen friends; and Enid and Mary lived close at hand, and the message could be sent that he wished to see them and their husbands. Mary would understand, and would lose no time; as regards Enid, well, he could only hope that she would come at once without awaiting her husband's return home. The thought that his whole plan might miscarry if they were out, rendered still more intense his longing and determination to see them; and he certainly did also wish to say good-bye to one or two other close friends.

The wife, half-fainting, carried out her husband's wishes without comment, hurriedly dispatching messengers and telegrams. He lay there listening to the ticking of the clock marking off his span of life, and listening for a ring at the door, with rapidly increasing excitement. The first ring heralded the advent of the doctor, who, on being informed of the man's request, acquiesced; it would make no difference, he said.

The wife, making a supreme effort not to break down, came in and arranged the pillows. He spoke to her tenderly, discussed with her the future of the two children and herself as calmly as the circumstances permitted. Then in somewhat awkward fashion he said to her:

"And now listen to me, Ada; keep my memory fresh in the minds of the children, but if later on, occasion offers for you to marry again, I do not want you to think that if I knew of it I should object."

"Don't talk like that," replied his wife; "it is quite hard enough for me to keep up without speaking of such things."

He waved his hand protestingly.

"Never mind," said he, "I always think of the future, and you may be glad some day that I should have spoken of this as I have done."

For some time they talked together, until they were interrupted by the arrival of the man's closest friend.

The dying man had a number of requests to make of his friend, the only one germane to this narrative being that a packet of letters in a certain drawer of his office desk should be destroyed. After a brief conversation the friend, much affected, departed.

There was a sound of voices in the hall, and for the first and last time in his life the dying man felt himself to be like a potentate with a stream of callers waiting audience of him.

There was no mistaking Mary Gordon's voice. He heard her ask the wife breathlessly regarding the accident, heard her say that she had at once telegraphed to her husband, but could not wait, so ran round immediately. Some further conversation which he could not hear, took place; then the door opened and the woman who, after his wife, had played the largest part in his life, entered the room. They looked at one another; she with dishevelled hair and great staring eyes, he with the look of a man who knows he is gazing for the last time on someone dear to him.

He was the first to break the silence.

"This is a pretty ending to the play," he said.

"But is there no hope?" she asked.

"Do you think the doctor would tell me with such brutal frankness that I had only a few hours to live if there were?" he replied, with a tinge of bitterness.

"Are you in pain, dear?" she said, bending over him.

"No," he replied, "that is the strange thing; and do you know, it seems to me that I can think and see things more clearly now than at any time in my life? I suppose it is the mind already to a great extent emancipated from the body."

"Always philosophizing, even near death. And what do you suppose is going to happen to me when you are gone?"

"There is Walter—" he said.

She waved her hand with a gesture of despair.

"Is this the time to talk like that? One thing, I shall follow you soon, be it to Heaven or Hell."

"Don't talk like that, Mary," he said, "it's silly."

"It's not silly," she replied. "You first showed me what there is in life; you brought out whatever soul there is in me, and if you are gone what is there to live for? I have no children," she added, shortly.

"You are over excited," he said, "but it is nice to hear you talk like that. Still, time heals everything. While I think of it," he added, "I have already arranged for your letters to be destroyed, so have no fear on that score."

"I don't care who knows," she said, defiantly.

"But I do," he said, simply; "and I am dying, and I would not cause Ada any pain. You women cannot understand that it is possible for a man to love two—yes, even more—of you at the same time."

She looked curiously at him.

"There is one question I have often wished to ask you, but have never dared," she said.

He nodded questioningly.

"Is there another?" she asked. "I have often thought there must be."

Flood's Loyalty to This City

San Francisco has no more loyal son than James L. Flood, the millionaire. This fact was demonstrated not long ago in a manner which will surprise many who think they know what is going on about them. The fact is that James L. Flood seriously considered disposing of all his San Francisco interests and making his permanent home in New York. This thought came to him in the most natural manner—he had tempting offers from various sources for nearly all of his valuable properties here. All the Flood holdings are in splendid condition, beautifully improved and so leased that they carry guarantees of handsome incomes for many years. This of course has recommended them with particular force to investors. When Flood received offers for various holdings he was sorely tempted. He likes New York very much on account of its varied opportunities for amusement, its proximity to Europe and so on. But though he was tempted he did not fall. Flood confided to a friend of his that the thought of all that San Francisco meant to him swept over him and gave him pause. Here his father accumulated his millions, here he was educated, here he formed his family ties, here in brief the name of Flood is indissolubly connected with civic history. When he pondered these things he determined that he would never forsake San Francisco. All the offers of investors were incontinently turned down.

A Spreckels Tradition Broken

It has remained for a member of the third generation of the Spreckels family to break a strong family tradition. The member in question is Jack Spreckels, the son of John D. and the tradition in question runs to the effect that Spreckels money should not be invested under ground. Claus Spreckels would never have anything to do with mines or oil wells. All his ventures were made in the upper spaces of the earth. The old sugar king used to say that he was too old to speculate on what the earth might produce and that he would leave all that sort of thing to the younger fellows. This by the way was also a rule of business with Collis P. Huntington. Adolph, John D. and other members of the Spreckels family followed the business rule laid down by their father. No mines or oil wells for them. But now Jack Spreckels has broken the rule, shattered the tradition. With Billy Maguire who used to be the secretary of the Bank Commission, he has gone into Bakersfield oil and stands a fine chance of making a barrel of money.

Kent is a Tough One

The news that William Kent, millionaire reformer of Marin County, intends to run for Congress against Duncan McKinlay has reached Chicago. Now Chicago knows Mr. Kent. He flourished in that opulent, breezy metropolis some years ago, and he did things there, things that worried certain practical politicians and hungry jobholders. Chicago remembers Kent, as may be learned from the Evening Post of that city. The Post says that it quickens the pulse to think of Kent in Congress; also it makes one's notion of insurgency real and vivid. The standpatters "wouldn't talk to a dog," says the Post, "the way Mr. Kent used to talk to Alderman Johnny Powers in the old City Council days—no sir-ee. And to have this wild Amos, this rich muckraker, speaking out his unpleasant moral ideas—surely, they would rather face a message from Roosevelt." The Post credits Kent with having an interesting vocabulary. "Short, vigorous words are at home in it, living peaceably—like the rattlesnake with the owl and the prairie dog—in a mind likewise tenanted with the classics and much modern political lore." I have heard that Mr. Kent is that rara avis, a conscientious, sincere reformer as well as a practical politician. If so he certainly feels sore every time he thinks of the breed of reformers he has been herding with in this neck of the woods.

Pity the Poor Poet

The case of Mr. James Henry MacLafferty is clearly one that calls for police interference. In a little volume of his verse published by Paul Elder he tells us that his Muse is a relentless tyrant who bids him write and heeds not his prayer for emancipation from poetic thraldom. Oft he pleads (to use his own words) "To spare me till another time" promising that later on he will "worship in poetic rhyme." But the tyrant muse is inexorable; there is no rest for the weary poet; he must ply his plectrum as the galley slave his oar. Mr. MacLafferty evokes my profound pity. Odesmithing for pleasure is perhaps one of the most agreeable of pastimes, but what an awful fate is that of MacLafferty. One has but to read his verses to apprehend the severity of the torture he is compelled to endure. With half an eye you can see they are not the exhalations of the spontaneous ferment of a heated imagination. Between the rhymes you can read the tragic story of travail. If the poet fails to move you with anything in the nature of imagery, at least he enables you to conjure up the vision of himself in the throes of parturition. The tyrant has made him sweat as well as rhyme.

Larks He Has and Has Not Met

Nevertheless it is evident that Mr. MacLafferty is a man of sentiment. It is evident that he loves to feel like a poet, to indulge in moral reflections on the state of his soul, revive recollections of joys and sorrows, and persuade himself that he is en rapport as it were with the hidden secrets of nature. But it is also evident that he doesn't write like a poet. Lacking keen sensibility, breadth of emotional capacity and spiritual insight, he strains impotently for a semblance of poetic life. Instead of ideas and thoughts such as are worthy of a melodious setting he gives us words and rhymes that are commonplace and uninspired. Also he gives us a good deal of nonsense. Why he should have gone to the trouble to tell us that the skylark never sang for him

> Save soaring in the pages

> To sing for all the ages, is a question that puzzles me. A curious poetic conception, this, of a bird singing for a poet by proxy. The meadow-lark MacLafferty has heard singing in the fields, and MacLafferty sings of the meadow-lark. His song is in the nature of a musical criticism. He tells us that the meadow-lark has a contralto voice and that he blends his treble with his alto. While he was about it he might also have assured us that the meadow-lark never gets off the key, and that in producing his tones he gives us a lesson in the art of concealing art.

Scorn not the Dictionary

In a pome addressed to the Columbia river MacLafferty pronounces it "Monarch crowned of mighty rivers." In the next line he withdraws the crown and reduces the river to the rank of 'peer of any flowing stream." This may be good poetry, but it is certainly a confusion of ideas, as our odesmith may learn by consulting his dictionary. Again, in a lyric about Shasta he sings of a "height profound." Surely a dictionary would serve as first aid to poetry in the case of Mr. MacLafferty. Far be it from me to suggest, however, that Mr. MacLafferty needs nothing but a dictionary to enable him to reach the Parnassian height. Nor do I wish to be understood as disapproving of his ventures in metrical compositions. If he must write, verse is the most suitable medium of expression for him. For as Goethe has said, he who would write prose must have something to say, while he who has nothing to say can make verses.

Judge Lawlor Rebuked

Judge William P. Lawlor has just received another lesson in criminal jurisprudence. The Court of Appeal of this district in setting aside the verdict in the case of E. W. Emmons, convicted of obtaining money by false pretenses, has pointed out for Judge Lawlor's benefit the impropriety of which he was guilty when he framed up an instruction to the jury in the interest of the prosecution. At the same time the court has taken occasion to explain to Judge Lawlor why it is in the nature of a perversion of justice for him to indulge in sinister insinuations calculated to influence a jury against a man accused of crime. It appears that the judge was asked to inform the jury of a fundamental principle of justice in this language: "The defendant has a legal right to take the stand as a witness, or not to do so, just as he pleases or as his counsel may advise. The mere fact that he does not testify raises no presumption or prejudice against him, and the jury cannot draw any unfavorable inference against a defendant who does not offer himself as a witness." Under the law it was Judge Lawlor's duty to give the foregoing instruction as requested by defendant's counsel. But Judge Lawlor in the fulness of his self-confidence, believed that by the exercise of a little cunning he could apparently comply with the law without doing so. A foxy judge, is Lawlor. Well equipped with tricks and stratagems is he. In lieu of the instruction asked for he read section 1323 of the Penal Code: "A defendant in a criminal action or proceeding cannot be compelled to be a witness against himself, but if he offer himself as a witness he may be cross-examined by the counsel for the People as to all matters about which he was examined in chief. His neglect or refusal to be a witness cannot in any manner prejudice him or be used against him on the trial or proceeding." Now what was wrong about this? The code contains the law, and surely it cannot be wrong to read the code to a jury. Apparently not. Judge Lawlor turned a trick against the defendant that the average layman cannot see through. It was decidedly wrong for him to read that section of the code to the jury; nay, his reading of it was a piece of mean, juridical cheating. The "question before the jury," as the Court of Appeal says, "was not what could be done if the defendant had taken the stand as a witness for himself, nor as to whether he could be compelled to testify against himself." The only question was whether he had a right to hold his tongue, and whether the jury had a right to draw an unfavorable inference from his holding it. The effect of the reading of the code was to inform the jury that if the defendant had taken the stand he could have been cross-examined, and furthermore to suggest the probability that he did not dare to subject himself to cross-examination. Thus did Judge Lawlor indulge his fondest predilection. And as a consequence of his congenital indisposition to give a man a fair trial the taxpayers of this city must undergo the expense of a second trial. The Court of Appeal has not permitted Judge Lawlor to go unrebuked. "The defendant," says the court, "was entitled to a fair trial. He was entitled to a simple statement of the law pertinent to the issue without having it coupled with another statement not pertinent to the issue which robbed it of all its force as to defendant's rights. He had the right to stand mute." Also: "We cannot conceive of any occasion arising during the trial of a criminal case for giving the jury an instruction as to the fact that the defendant could be cross-examined if he should be a witness."

A Tribute to McManus

Lieutenant McManus of the police force is a fine fellow. His Irish wit is as rich as his brogue, his whiskers are the envy of all the captains on the force and his athletic feats are famous. You would not think it of one of his bulk but Lieutenant McManus can turn the most graceful flips into a swimming tank. These and other accomplishments has Lieutenant McManus and in addition a host of friends. But the lieutenant has just lost an old-time friend and thereby hangs this tale. Terry Welch was a friend of Lieutenant McManus, a very dear friend indeed. Terry, by the same token, keeps a bit of a cigar stand and as business in the cigar line is no better than it ought to be, Terry has also started a bit of a pool room in the rear of his cigar stand. When the chief of police gave orders recently to shut up the pool rooms, a patrolman was stationed outside of Terry's place to see that nobody went inside to make a bet. Being a man of spirit Terry resented the intrusion of the bluecoat. "Go away" he bade him many times, but all in vain. And then: "I'll make ye go away. Liftinint McManus is me frind." "Much good that will do you," answered the guardian of public morals. So Terry swore a mighty oath that he would have the policeman put off the block and went to see McManus about it. He returned dejected. "Well, did you see your friend?" mocked the policeman. "What frind?" countered Terry. "Why, your friend McManus" explained the bluecoat. "Me frind McManus is it?" answered the wrathy cigar man. "Let me tell ye, he's no frind of mine. If a million of his kind was in jail and two-bits would save thim all, I'd drop the quarter in the bay, so help me."

"Don't be afraid of the bacon, Mr. Jenkins," said the landlady to the new lodger.

"Not at all, madam. I've seen a piece twice as large, and it did not frighten me a bit."

A Union Labor Incident

An incident which occurred recently at the Novelty Theater affords an excellent illustration of the impossible lengths to which the labor unions carry the application of their rules. If it does not help to explain what is robbing San Francisco of her legitimate opportunities it will be told in vain. A large club of talented youngsters hired the Novelty Theater one night in order to give an amateur dramatic performance. For an orchestra they had a number of girls who played the piano, violin, mandolin and other stringed instruments. To handle the mechanical part of the performance they hired an electrician, a property-man, a stage carpenter and two assistants, all of them union men. If they had had more experience in matters theatrical they would have hired only the electrician and a stage hand because two men could easily have attended to their needs but they did not know this and accordingly supplied work for five men instead of two. Were the men grateful for the night's work? Perhaps they were—until they discovered that the orchestra was composed of non-union girls. They declared that they could only work in conjunction with union musicians and as it was too late to change the orchestra when this ultimatum was delivered, they went on a strike. If sympathetic theatrical men had not come to their assistance the youngsters would have been compelled to postpone their performance. But a couple of gentlemen connected with the theater took off their tuxedos, rolled up their sleeves and saved the night for the kids. What do you suppose those boys and girls think of the practical workings of union labor?

A Monument to an Editor

A most unusual thing was done at the meeting of the Sacramento Valley Development Association in Colusa last week. It was resolved to erect a monument to the memory of an editor. This is the first time anything of the kind has been suggested or even thought of in this country since the perpetuation of Benjamin Franklin's memory in bronze. And it can hardly be said that the tribute was paid to Franklin's memory on account of the services he rendered to his country as a journalist. The fact is, as we have been reminded by the Sacramento Valley Development Association, that in this country which has its character formed by the press, which regards the press as the foremost palladium of its liberties, the men behind the press are not held in high esteem. The pen of course is mightier than the sword; there is no force so great as the newspaper, which is book, pulpit, platform, forum, all in one, but while the soldier and statesman captivate posterity and are sculptured prodigally for the inspiration of generations to come the editor goes to his grave with no prospect of being honored either in song, metal or marble. Therefore the case of General Will S. Green, founder of the Colusa Sun, the editor to whom a monument is to be erected by the Sacramento Valley Development Association is a notable exception. And of course there is a reason for this being so. General Green is to be nobly remembered because he nobly lived. A man of fine feeling, of high impulses, his conception of the obligations of a newspaper were such that the Colusa Sun commanded universal respect and confidence. A newspaper is good or bad according to the character of the man that makes it. The Colusa Sun reflected the character of General Green, and from its tone it was evident that according to his philosophy if the liberty of the press meant the liberty of defamation and calumniation he was ready to part with his share of it. True to his philosophy he wielded powerful influence and won the affections of all that knew him.

Mrs. Sam Rainey's Benevolence

"Kid" Nelson, one of the most popular members of the Corinthian Yacht Club, is being congratulated on the good fortune which recently came to him. Like many good things in this life, the good fortune came on the wings of sorrow and young Nelson is mourning in the midst of his prosperity. Mrs. Sam Rainey, the widow of the well-known politician, met Nelson at the race track where she was for years a constant visitor. The youngster was employed there and first came to Mrs. Rainey's notice on account of his smiling promptness in running errands for her. After the death of her husband Mrs. Rainey, being childless and lonesome, adopted young Nelson and he lived under her roof with all the attentions of a favored son until her recent death.

Mrs. Mighels Explains

Mrs. Philip Verrill Mighels writes the following letter in reply to my comments of last week:

1607 Baker St., S. F., Calif.
May 29th, 1910.

To the Editor of Town Talk:

Dear Sir: I agree with you in all you say, but an ellipse occurred, and a comma was missed, which made it appear otherwise. Don Quixote is magnificent. I meant only that it was strong meat for a child of eleven and that for a child Gil Blas was worse, only the innocence of childhood made it innocuous. The wit and brilliance of Montaigne and Boccaccio remove them from classification with the authors of the racy volumes of the later French schools. I must tell you that my little girl was over twenty and a little married lady of great dignity when she became my literary censor as she was already over my manners and English generally, for she inherited her father's instinct for grammar and good taste.

As for the comparison between the value of Anna Karenina and the value of Madame Bovary, if you will give me one moment I think I can make clear the distinction I draw between them. It is properly within the province of literary art to deal with the terrible, such as sorrow, grief, jealousy, revenge and death. But it is not within the province of literary art to deal with the horrible, such as mutilation, foulness, cannibalism, deformity and mania. The mere mention of these latter arouses disgust. The terrible relates to the normal passions of mankind, the horrible to the abnormal. It is not the immoral that I am inveighing against in literary art—it is the abnormal. Anna Karenina is a natural woman. She loves and she suffers as a natural woman would do. Madame Bovary is a case for the doctor not the author. There are worse crimes than breaking the seventh commandment, such as ingratitude and treachery. The long drawn-out revenge of Anna's husband in refusing to get a divorce from her and refusing to let her marry the man she loved is the terrible passion that masters that drama of Russian life. Any natural woman can sympathize with Anna. No normal woman can sympathize with Madame Bovary. She would drown herself first. The nice people of France do not read these books any more than do the nice people of San Francisco spend their evenings in the opium joints of Chinatown. They have delightful books to read there, such as Fanchon the Cricket and Sans Famille—which latter I am now reading with childish delight for the third time. But I brought it with me from London. You cannot get it here.

With best wishes for your continued success, and admiration for your fairness and justice, I am very sincerely yours,

—Mrs. Philip Verrill Mighels.

In Answer to Miss Coolbrith

Herman Scheffauer, at present a resident in the University settlement, New York, has called to my attention a very beautiful poem written by Miss Ethel Talbot in answer to "When the Grass Shall Cover Me" by Miss Ina Coolbrith. Scheffauer says that Miss Talbot is full of admiration of the beauty and pathos of Miss Coolbrith's lines but objects to their burden of melancholy and helpless resignation. So she has written "Give Love Today." Miss Talbot is one of the most gifted as well as youngest of England's poets. Here is Miss Coolbrith's poem:

"When the Grass Shall Cover Me"

When the grass shall cover me,
Head to foot where I am lying;
When not any wind that blows,
Summer blooms nor Winter snows,
Shall awake me to your sighing:
Close above me as you pass,
You will say "How kind she was."
You will say "How true she was."
When the grass grows over me.

When the grass shall cover me,
Holden close to earth's warm bosom;
While I laugh, or weep, or sing,
Nevermore, for anything,
You will find in blade and blossom,
Sweet small voices, odorous,
Tender pleaders in my cause,
That shall speak me as I was—
When the grass grows over me.

When the grass shall cover me
Ah, beloved, in my sorrow,
Very patient, I can wait,
Knowing that, or soon or late,
There will dawn a clearer morrow:
When your heart will moan, "Alas!
Now I know how true she was:
Now I know how dear she was"—
When the grass grows over me!

This is Miss Talbot's answer:

"Give Love Today"

When the lean, gray grasses
Cover me, bury me deep,
No sea wind that passes
Shall break my sleep.

When you come, my lover,
Sorrowful-eyed to me,
Earth mine eyes will cover;
I shall not see.

Though with sad words splendid,
Praising, you call me dear,
It will be all ended;
I shall not hear

You may live love's riot
Laughingly over my head,
But I shall lie quiet
With the grey dead.

Love, you will not wake me
With all your singing carouse,
Nor your dancing shake me
In my dark house.

Our California Literati

Scheffauer, by the way, has been telling New York through the columns of the Sun the story of what California has done for American literature. He has not attempted to tell the whole story by any means, contenting himself with fragmentary extracts from the lengthy record. Scheffauer says that Californian writers are essentially the product of Californian civilization. He thinks that the influence of our climate is as undoubted as that of old Greece and Italy. It grows larger, stronger and better formed bodies than that of the East and the environment stimulates intellect, imagination, ambition and soul. Another influence, he finds, is that of the old pastoral civilization, Spanish and Mexican. He explains that California was the home of great land owners and missionaries, isolated from the rest of the world by its boundaries, the Pacific, the Sierra Nevadas and Mexico and that the poetic glamor of the old life is still felt. Then too there is the glamor of the Orient, "an almost actual touch with China and Japan." He adds that "most potent of all perhaps is the opportunity for a free, open air existence, almost Dionysian, in close companionship with sun and fruit and flowers. Then there are the traditions of the Argonauts and pioneers; all make for romance and poetry. Those early men were of adventurous spirit and journeyed in the days of arduous and terrible travel. It was a picked lot of men and women who settled, the unfit being eliminated; this has had its own effect on the character of the descendants. Also the people are a wine drinking people, which fact has always been associated with poetic inspiration. Whatever the cause or causes may be, California has proved herself a fosterer of bards, either native born or quickly adopted. Of all poets I rank bards as of the highest type, followed by poets merely, then poettes, and lastly, poetasters, of which the tribe is innumerable."

An Imposing List

Scheffauer tells of the great exodus of Californians, following the appearance of William Randolph Hearst in eastern journalism. "At the time of the first exodus," he says, "those in power here prophesied that there would soon be a walking back on uppers. Some who have refused to take part in fulfilling this prophecy are Robert H. Davis, editor of Munsey's Magazine, Robert Mackay of the same publication, Lincoln Steffens, Cosgrave of Everybody's and Bailey Millard, formerly of the Cosmopolitan. They didn't walk; they stayed. There soon came a time when most of the popular magazines were edited by Californians." Then he goes on to enumerate some of the writers who have achieved country-wide fame. "Joaquin Miller and Edwin Markham are deans of the bards of course, while George Sterling of the younger school is of incomparable powers. Edmund Clarence Stedman has termed Ina Coolbrith the greatest of our woman poets. Others are John Vance Cheney, Edward Robeson Taylor, Lorenzo Sosso, Lionel Josaphare, Nora May French, the young genius who committed suicide, Louis Robertson, Charles Keeler and Herbert Bashford. Many distinctive writers hailing from out there are more appreciated in England than in the East. A notorious example is Ambrose Bierce. His "The Midst of Life," issued in San Francisco seventeen years ago, has been reprinted dozens of times abroad—pirated in Germany, France and England. It was to the influence of California that one of the greatest world poets responded, and California is inclined to claim Robert Louis Stevenson for her own together with his close friend Charles Warren Stoddard. Among other children, native born and adopted, are Gertrude Atherton, Jack London, Helen Hunt Jackson, Frank Norris, who participated in the eastward exodus; Miriam Michelson, Herman Whitaker, John Muir, Mary Austin, Phillip Mighels, Geraldine Bonner, Adeline Knapp, George Wharton James, Eleanor Gates, W. C. Morrow, C. F. Lummis, Juliet Wilbor Tompkins, James Hopper and many others. How the Irwins, Will and Wallace, and Gelett Burgess added eastern laurels to those gained in California is well known. Then there is Emma Frances Dawson with a gift almost as weird as Poe's—and a neglect almost as great. California has given her playwrights too, among them Elmer Harris, Eugene Walter, Belasco and Richard Tully; and the same atmosphere produced artists for acting—Modjeska, adapting her for America, David Warfield, Nance O'Neil and many, many others. Then there is Sibyl Sanderson, Rita Fornia and—creators of a new art—Maude Allan, Isadora Duncan and Ruth St. Denis. You see that California produces something else besides prizefighters."

Saphead—Weally, don't you think—
Miss Cutting—Not while you are here. It would seem selfish.

The American Chantecler

Some of the most interesting things that have been said about Theodore Roosevelt in Europe have not come to us via the Atlantic cable. The correspondents engaged in celebrating the Colonel as he moves along astonishing the world and paralyzing the groundlings are of the opinion that his fellow-citizens care to learn only of the homage that is paid to him. Anything tending to show that he is not taken seriously by everybody they solicitously suppress. For example they have concealed from us the fact that Paris was convulsed with laughter by Georges Bourdon, who called attention in Le Figaro to his discovery of the fact that Roosevelt and Chantecler speak the same language. In a letter addressed to Edmond Rostand he says of Colonel Roosevelt: "He has fulfilled the ideal you have presented to us in your play." And this he proves by a comparison of the ideas expressed by Chantecler of the play and Chantecler of the Sorbonne lecture. Bourdon heard the lecture. Speaking of Roosevelt, he says: "The more he brandished his ideas, the more familiar they seemed. Where had I met them before. Of a sudden I remembered. In 'Chantecler'." The keynote of the Sorbonne speech, according to Bourdon, is expressed in these lines from "Chantecler":

"I crow in my vale, and my ultimate aim
Is to teach other roosters to do just the same."

The witty Frenchman concludes thus:

No doubt you will be as much amazed as I am that an American who has been taking a vacation from politics by shooting wild beasts should come out of Africa with the same thoughts about humanity and life and destiny that are expressed by a poet who writes plays among the passion flowers of Southern France.

Roosevelt and Grant Compared

The correspondents with the Colonel have not thought it worth while to let us know what "Labby's" paper thinks of Teddy. Yet there is much in Truth to inspire wholesome meditation. Listen to Labby:

The tour of Gen. Grant, when ex-President, round the capitals and courts of Europe was humdrum and quiet, and indeed just nothing compared to that now made by Col.—to give him his military title—Roosevelt. Yet Grant turned the tide of victory from South to North. He brought the United States in safety and without a Caesarist wind-up through one of the greatest civil wars ever known. He must have passed through Europe unnoticed had not the different monarchs he called on invited him and Mrs. Grant to dinner. And they did this without going out of the ordinary course. Not a soul noticed Gen. Grant on the boulevards and in the Rue de la Paix as he sauntered to and from the American bar to take a glass of whiskey as an appetizer before each meal. His instinct led him to keep his goods on the back shelves of his store. That of ex-President Roosevelt is to show them well in the front window. But few persons thought Grant interesting until he revealed his great character and tender nature in his last illness from a cancer in the throat. In that time of sore suffering he wrote his memoirs, not for any egotistical satisfaction, but to assure a fairly good income to Mrs. Grant. The pen to correct and revise only fell from his hand a few hours before the fatal moment.

Think not that I want to draw any invidious comparison between Gen. Grant and the ex-President whose rush around the capitals and courts of Europe has turned all attention from the approaching comet. The parallel is rather to bring out the incapacity of the public from top to bottom to see greatness when not set forth with some striking or sensational element. The course of going straight from the White House to the wilds of Uganda was too much out of the common not to hypnotize all lookers on, imperial, royal and other.

Nat Landsberger's Fright

Nat Landsberger, the favorite violinist of the Press Club, is head of the violin department of the University of the Pacific at San Jose. He was down there recently at the graduation exercises of his pupils. After the ceremonies he was the guest of Professor Pierre Douillet, dean of the music department, at luncheon. The two musicians discussed a sumptuous repast at one of the best known of San Jose's restaurants. Professor Douillet stepped up to the desk on his way out and Landsberger loitered, waiting for him. While Douillet was speaking to the cashier Nat stood idly, his hands clasped behind him, vaguely conscious that his back was turned to a table on which stood a small square box. Suddenly he felt a cold slimy touch on his fingers and a mixed emotion of loathing and horror swept over him. He wheeled around and read on the box: "Beware! Live Rattlesnake." The deadly reptile was regarding him with its terrible eyes. The wire screen prevented the rattler from using its fangs on Nat's hand but it had darted its loathly tongue at his finger. Landsberger has a morbid dread of snakes, in common with many musicians, and he nearly fainted from the shock. Professor Douillet took him quickly to a drug store and washed the hand in carbolic soap, but though there was no danger Landsberger did not recover from the shock for twenty-four hours. The rattler had been caught in the San Bernardino mountains and brought north by a friend of the restaurant keeper. Truly it was a queer thing to put on exhibition in such a place.

Where Life is Life

* By David Leslie Brown

Tired?

Dragged out?

Over-worked?

Or just simply sick of the city and its roar and rustle, its dusty streets and glaring walls?

Listen.

Do you want to freshen yourself up?

Don't take tonics—that method of recuperation is an insult to any respectable stomach.

Don't quit your work and lay around the house—stagnation breeds a hundred devils.

Man is essentially a child of Nature. He is never thoroly happy and contented when he is confined to the city where he labors for himself and others.

Isn't that right?

It's true we are fascinated by our business or social interests here—and we are proud of our city growing daily more splendid and complete on her many hills. But fascination is not contentment, and pride is not happiness.

Right again?

Good!

No matter who we are, no matter what our temperaments are, we're all human. And the human is a combination of the Divine and the Natural. Some people say all three are the same—perhaps so. There are many Trinities that are One.

So then—being human—we are filled with longings and desires for Things and Enjoyments: for the Real and the Satisfying in Life.

And being Divine—we know how to fulfill our desires: the knowledge of the Art of Living is actually ours. Control of conditions is the Divine Right of Man.

Again—being Natural—we turn to the open fields, to the eternal hills, to the running brooks, and the pulsing seas, for the delight and happiness that the City with its squared sections of masonry—however elaborate—cannot give.

Brother—you and I are longing again for the Open Road. There's a need in our bodies for a breath of the pine woods, and the odor of damp earth. There's a need in our souls for a little communion with the Naturally Divine.

Listen—I know where the trout can be seen in deep, clear water, that tumbles one instant over rocky beds, and the next sweeps silently on in limpid swirls. I know where there are horses which we can mount and ride over mountain trails, among such scenes that even Gods must worship there. I know where rocky, castled crags rise high into deep blue skies—where a Shasta's eternal snows glisten in a brilliant sun-light thru verdant frames of wild lilac and maple and willow. I know where tall pines and firs sway gently in a soothing breeze—where the perfume of the wild honeysuckle, the bay, and the azalea intoxicate the soul. I know where the Sacramento River and the Soda Creek ripple harmonies in shaded woods—where elfs and fairies dance.

I know—for I've been there.

Come!

Come, brother—pack up your khaki suit, get our your old high boots—and that crumpled hat you wore last year! Tie up your fishing-rods and net, brighten up that greasy Winchester—let's go where life is life! A comfortable sleep in a Pullman tonight, and tomorrow morning we are there—at Castle Crag.

They'll meet us at the train—bright, happy-faced men and women who take care of this wonder-spot in the Shasta Range. They'll take us up the shaded road, over the bridge where we can see the trout at play in the rushing water; up—up among pine alleys, past cool fountains splashing in the morning sun-light; up—up to level grounds where are nestled cozy log-cabins among the bushes and the trees. There we'll see Mount Shasta, and the Crags; there we'll look on great vistas of this ten-thousand-acre tract of forest and farm. There'll be flowers in our darkened room in the log-cabin—they're always there: somebody thinks of us all the time! There'll be hot running water in the corner, and a cooling shower-bath—say, doesn't your blood tingle already?

Then there'll be a steaming luncheon awaiting us in the Tavern, after a lounge and a walk around the magnificent grounds, where are tennis-courts, a reading and dance-hall, vine-clad arbors—stone-piles, and wood-shacks. These latter are the monuments here of the Better Life—the life of freedom, of joyful work that is play, of animation and inspiration.

Oh, there's all of this at Castle Crag! I know—for I was there.

Brother—is that grip packed yet?

Mrs. Miller Graham Unhusbanded

Through the medium of a cable despatch from London the Call has worked a remarkable change in the marital condition of Mrs. William Miller Graham of Santa Barbara. From a fascinating wife it has metamorphosed her into a "fascinating widow," a transformation calculated to fill Mr. William Miller Graham with bewilderment. Mr. William Miller Graham is still in the land of the living, in fact it may be said with considerable assurance that Mr. William Miller Graham is very much alive. Further than that, Mr. William Miller Graham is very much devoted to his wife, though not more so than Mrs. William Miller Graham is devoted to her husband. But even the most devoted husband may be pardoned for viewing with some concern the cabled report that his wife—turned for the nonce into a "fascinating widow"—is the object of a romantic passion. The despatch stated that Lord Robert Osborn Innes-Ker "is said to be desperately smitten with Mrs. Miller Graham." It may be true that this younger brother of the Duke of Roxburghe who is reputed to be a fortune-hunter, has succumbed to the charm of Mrs. Miller Graham's charming personality and many millions, but it is not, assuredly, the fault of Mrs. Miller Graham that a lord should fall in love with her without taking the trouble to ascertain whether or not she is free to accept his attentions. The question is, what will Miller Graham do? Will he summon his charming wife from London or will he join her in the magnificent Grosvenor Square mansion which she leased and which would have been the scene of brilliant entertainments had not the death of the king brought the season to a close before it commenced, so to say? Miller Graham has been increasing his wealth by successful oil deals of late. In conjunction with William Mitchell of the New York house of E. F. Hutton and Company he recently added another million to his fortune and started East as soon as the deal was completed. Will he go on to London or will Mrs. Graham join him in New York?

The Wiltsees to Live Here

The tall figure of Ernest Wiltsee, mining engineer and longtime associate of John Hays Hammond, has been much in evidence around the Palace Hotel during the past few days. There is a reason for his presence here, a reason which will interest both the financiers and the social bavardes. Ernest Wiltsee has been down at Bakersfield as the representative of a big French syndicate and Bakersfield has yielded him wealth as it has yielded it to a thousand others during the past year. Wiltsee's activities have already been rewarded to the tune of one hundred thousand dollars and if the oil wells in which he is interested continue to yield as bountifully as they are yielding now he will pull a cool million out of the fields. That Wiltsee is greatly impressed by the possibilities of the Bakersfield oil fields there can be no doubt. He has given up his office in Broad street, New York, and has told some of his friends here that he will give over his mining activities to devote himself exclusively to oil for some time to come. That means that his headquarters will be at Bakersfield indefinitely and that California will see more of him than it has for some time past. And this is where the bavardes should sit up and take notice. Mrs. Wiltsee is to join her husband here and society will be given an opportunity to enjoy her charming personality. Mrs. Wiltsee is a famous beauty and is a wonderfully artistic dresser. She is passionately fond of pearls and these jewels appear in most of her portraits. I cannot at the moment recall an American woman who has been painted by more celebrated artists than Mrs. Wiltsee. Artists are overjoyed at the chance to have her sit for them because she possesses the exceptional personality which inspires their brushes. Some of our artists have long yearned for the opportunity to put her beauty on canvas and now that she is to be with us I make no doubt that she will sit for one or two or them.

Taking Time by the Forelock

A good story about one of our society leaders is just now going the round of the tea tables amid a chorus of titters and giggles. The daughter of this lady is traveling in Europe and is at present exploring the antiquities of Rome. The girl's birthday was a few days ago and to celebrate it the society leader invited a number of her daughter's girl friends to drink tea with her. In the course of the function she suggested that it would be a nice compliment for all the members of the tea party to share the expense of a cablegram to her absent daughter. The girls took to the idea and the society leader sat down at her desk and prepared a lengthy cablegram of congratulation and motherly advice. Now one of the girls happened to be of a practical turn of mind and it struck her that the long cable would cost a good deal of money. So she suggested that perhaps the idea better be abandoned as it would arrive in Rome the day after the birthday. "Oh, I thought of that," explained the society leader very sweetly, "so I sent it yesterday." The girls saw that they were "stung," but without a murmur each and everyone of them paid her share of the cost of the cablegram sent the day before.

Charlie Hastings' Infatuation

A friend in Washington has given me a quiet tip to look out for the announcement of the engagement of Charlie Hastings, well known here and in Los Angeles, to the beautiful Miss Florence Carney whose family lives in the national capital. Indeed I should not be at all surprised to hear of the engagement, for I have had reasons of my own for supposing that Hastings has fallen a victim to the charms of this very magnetic young lady. For several years Hastings has avoided the limelight, a conspicuous change of demeanor which caused a great deal of remark. I understand that Miss Carney is far from averse to his addresses and that she has asked him to meet her people. After that a formal announcement would be in the natural order of events.

Hanford Joins His Wife

R. G. Hanford, the millionaire whose interests include the wonderful Natomas Consolidated, leaves for the East this week and will join his wife in London for a tour of Europe. This announcement sets at rest the persistent rumors, no doubt wholly unfounded, that Mrs. Hanford intended to secure a legal separation. Just where this disagreeable rumor originated it would be difficult to say, but no doubt it was started at the time of the unfortunate de la Montanya affair. It will be recalled that Hanford was the dinner guest of Mrs. de la Montanya on the evening that she committted suicide and that she used his pistol for the deed. The unpleasant notoriety connected with that affair caused Hanford to leave San Francisco as quickly as was consistent with the adequate explanation of his connection with the happenings of that fateful night. Mrs. Hanford was in the East at that time and Hanford joined her there. Now that they have planned a continental tour together, no doubt the story of their disagreement will die of inanition.

Will She Take a Fourth Husband?

Out of New York comes the rumor that Mrs. Jackson Gouraud is going to marry again. This may surprise some who are not familiar with the unusual temperament of this California girl, but others who have known her and witnessed her eccentricities will accept the rumor quite as a matter of course. It is not very long since Jackson Gouraud died. The conventional year of mourning still lacks several months, but Mrs. Jackson Gouraud is far from conventional. The man whose name is being associated by Dame Rumor with that of Mrs. Gouraud is Emerson Foote. This gentleman, it seems, has been on intimate terms with the Gourauds for a long time and has redoubled his attentions since Mrs. Gouraud was widowed. Mrs. Gouraud is by no means a young woman now but her old friends still think of her as Amy Crocker, the vivacious, the spectacular, the bizarre. As everybody knows her first husband was Porter Ashe. When that romance ran its course she married Harry Gillig. After a second application to the divorce court she became Amy Crocker-Ashe-Gillig-Gouraud while her daughter by Porter Ashe married the brother, Powers Gouraud. And now the belle of the old days in Sacramento and San Francisco may become Amy Crocker-Ashe-Gillig-Gouraud-Foote.

A Social Censor Coming

I hear that the exquisite Andre de Fouquieres is thinking of paying a visit to America and of extending his travels even to this wild and wooly edge of our crude continent. If that be true we should be prepared to welcome him and incline respectful ears while he lisps out his ideas of what's what. Andre de Fouquieres combines the qualities of Hall McAllister, Ned Greenway, Berry Wall and Harry Lehr which is going some, as our debutantes would say. He is the social arbiter of Paris and he doesn't altogether admire American women. He thinks that they are deucedly overrated in the matter of dress, not of course those favored few who have been schooled in his beloved Paris but the mobs who scamper over from vulgar little New York. If Andre thinks poorly of the American woman he thinks less of the American man. Him too he criticises in the matter of dress. In fact Andre rarely criticises anything else, for he considers dress about the most important thing in the

The Morris-Garlick Nuptials

A pretty wedding of the past week was that which made Miss Isabel Morris the bride of William Hobart Garlick, at Grace Pro-Cathedral on Wednesday afternoon at 4 o'clock. The bride who was gowned in a dainty lingerie gown, with white hat, was given away by her mother, Mrs. W. F. Morris, the Rev. J. Wilmer Gresham reading the impressive Episcopal service. Miss Jeanette Powell was the maid of honor, and for the occasion wore a dotted mull gown of white, with pink and white lingerie hat, and a shower bouquet of Cecil Breuner roses. The bride's bouquet was a shower of lilies of the valley and white tulle. A. L. Wilcox attended Mr. Garlick as best man, and the ushers were H. K. Defendorf, Frank Huddart and Mr. Barnett. Following the church service a reception and wedding supper were enjoyed at the Hotel Victoria where Mrs. Morris and her daughter reside. Pink and white sweet peas and ferns made the decorations for the several round tables that surrounded the bride's. The bride's table carried a pretty arrangement of lilies of the valley and Cecil Breuner roses. Seated at the table of honor were Mr. and Mrs. Garlick, Mr. and Mrs. H. K. Defendorf, Miss Powell, Miss Lind, Miss Helen Hough, Miss Browning, Miss Richards, Miss Linette Hough and Miss Dora Thayer. Mr. Garlick and his bride are to make their home in Berkeley on their return from a honeymoon trip which is taking them south. Mrs. Garlick is the youngest daughter of Mrs. W. F. Morris, and like her mother and sisters, is possessed of more than an ordinary share of good looks and grace of manner. She is a graduate of Miss Head's School. Mr. Garlick is a Cincinnati man who has been associated with local business interests for the past two or three years. Previous to the wedding the bride-to-be entertained ten friends at luncheon on Tuesday last in the private dining room at the Hotel Victoria. Pink roses and ferns made a beautiful decoration for the table, the pink color obtaining in the dainty favors and the bon bon holders. Delicately colored place cards bore the names of Mrs. Defendorf, Miss Coswell, Miss Thayer, Miss Browning, Miss Lind, Miss Stanton, Miss Hough, Miss Parnell, Miss Trask and Miss Morris.

How can you more fittingly express your appreciation of her invitation than by taking along a box of candy from one of Geo. Haas & Sons' four stores: Phelan Building, Fillmore at Ellis, Van Ness at Sutter and 28 Market street, near Ferry.

Many Los Angeles Brides

The month of May saw an unusual number of interesting weddings in Southern California and June promises to retain its reputation as the banner month for brides. Miss Francisca Broderick, one of the most popular singers of the society Kirmess, was married last week to Walter J. Schmal after a short period of prenuptial entertainment in the upper circles of society. Miss Alice Fay and Glen A. Calkins also celebrated their wedding about the same date. Young Calkins and his bride will spend a month honeymooning in California over automobile routes. Miss Mabel Phelps, a most popular member of the younger set, surprised her friends by setting her wedding date a little in advance of the day announced for the celebration of her marriage to Clarence Douglas Bricker. The couple are sojourning at Santa Barbara. One of the most interesting brides of the first days of June is Mrs. Thomas Ridgway who, as Miss Grace Rowley, the daughter of a prominent capitalist of Los Angeles, was introduced to formal society very recently. Miss Beatrice Banning Ayer, daughter of a prominent Boston family, was united in marriage within the last week to Lieutenant George Smith Patton Jr. of the Fifteenth United States Cavalry. The wedding was solemnized at Beverly, Mass., but as Miss Pixley is a daughter of the D. C. Pixleys and closely related to Frank Pixley, the librettist.

In the Social Spotlight

Miss Isabel McLaughlin, the charming stepdaughter of Dr. W. A. McEnery, arrived home from New York on Tuesday and with Miss Theresa McEnery has taken apartments at the Fairmont. Miss McLaughlin is attending one of the fashionable finishing schools in New York where she will graduate this fall. It is expected that her debut will be one of the social events of the season, as she is not only beautiful and talented but an heiress in her own right as well.

Among the recent arrivals at the Fairmont are General John McClellan and family who have returned from an extensive trip to Honolulu where General McClellan has been on duty for some time. In the party are Mrs. McClellan, Miss McClellan, Miss Josephine McClellan and Master John McClellan. General McClellan is expecting orders to call him East in the near future.

Mrs. Edward Barron and her two daughters who have been at their summer home in Mayfield came up to the Fairmont early in the week for the wedding of Ward Barron and Miss Genevieve Harvey. On Monday night Mrs. Barron gave a dinner at the Fairmont to the immediate families of the bride and groom. The table was decorated in American beauty roses and after the dinner the party attended the performance of Maude Adams at the Columbia.

Mr. Richard Costello and Mr. D. M. Brereton of O'Connor, Moffatt & Co. are spending their vacation at Paraiso Hot Springs.

The rates from San Francisco to Paraiso Hot Springs have been cut from $8.00 to $6.35 and from San Jose to $4.70, including auto.

Mrs. Jack Matheis accompanied by Mrs. H. M. Alexander drove her motor car from this city to Del Monte on Saturday night, negotiating the San Juan grade with complete success. The two ladies made the return trip on Monday afternoon.

The annual opening dinner and ball of the Santa Cruz Casino and Cottage City will take place on Saturday night, June 18. There will be a band, an orchestra, fireworks, electrical illuminations, confetti battles, etc., every concession in the Casino and on the Boardwalk being open to the public. The annual dinner in the Grill Room will take place in the evening at seven o'clock, and those who desire to attend should make reservations ahead. The cost will be $1.50 per plate. During the dinner Dobronyi's celebrated Hungarian orchestra will render a select program and male and female singers will also assist in the entertainment. The celebrated Santa Cruz Beach Band, composed of thirty pieces, will furnish a band concert on the bandstand in front of the Casino, and fireworks will be displayed from the end of the pier. The twenty-two thousand electric lights, both inside and outside of the buildings, will be turned on, all of which will tend to make this a brilliant occasion. At nine p. m. the annual grand ball will take place in the Ball Room with music by the brass band.

Messrs. H. M. A. Miller, C. A. Miller and E. C. Miller spent the week end at Aetna Springs.

Mr. and Mrs. R. H. Pease motored to Aetna Springs recently.

The Beringer Musical Club announces it fifteenth piano and vocal recital for the evening of June 7, under the direction of Prof. and Mme. Joseph Beringer, at Century Club Hall. Miss Irene De Martini, Miss Frances Westington, Miss Zdenka Buben, Mrs. H. J. Widenmann, Mrs. Lois Patterson-Wesitsh, Messrs. Harry Bultmann, Milton Mowbray and Harry Samuels will be participants.

The exhibition and sale of the San Francisco Artists Society which came to an end on Saturday night was one of the most attractive and successful of all that have been held. The Concert Room of the Palace in which the exhibit was held, with its harmonious tones of gray and gold, its soft lights and architectural symmetry lends itself perfectly to an occasion of this kind. Robinson's "Hetch-Hetchy Valley" attracted much attention, not only because of its merit but also because it is the only painting of the valley that has been shown here. Chris Jorgenson's "Lyell Group," a scene in the high Sierras, also caused much comment. Among the artists exhibiting were Charles Dickman, Guiseppe Cadenasso, Gottardo F. P. Piazzoni, C. Chapel Judson, Ferdinard Burgdorff, W. A. Coulter, H. W. Seawell, Chris Jorgenson, L. P. Latimer, Theodore Wores, Maurice Del Mue, Will Sparks, Leslie Boronda, Xavier Martinez, Eugen Neuhaus, Joseph Raphael, Gordon Coutts, H. Hammarstrom and Ralph Stackpole.

San Francisco and Santa Barbara will be sold for $10.90. At least five hundred visitors are expected and many reservations have already been made at the Potter, their headquarters.

W. C. McChord Jr., U. S. A., was among those registering at the Hotel Victoria during the week.

Mr. and Mrs. T. A. Graham arrived at the Potter during the week from Los Angeles by automobile. Mr. Graham is assistant freight and passenger agent of the Southern Pacific Company for the Pacific division.

Mr. and Mrs. Barbe Hook arrived recently in their machine and are guests at the Potter where Mr. Hook is well known. Mr. and Mrs. Hook were married about a week ago, Mrs. Hook having been Miss Rebecca B. Pearce.

Mr. and Mrs. W. R. Stone, prominent people of Duluth, Minn., who have spent the past winter at the Potter Hotel, left for home on last Saturday. They have spent their winters here for many years.

Mrs. B. N. Rowley was a dinner hostess of the week at the Hotel Victoria where she entertained sixteen guests in honor of T. N. Swyney.

Mr. and Mrs. A. R. Cotton and Mr. and Mrs. Searles were among the week-end guests at The Peninsula, San Mateo.

Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Ehrman have left the city for San Mateo where they will spend the summer at The Peninsula.

Mr. James Carolan was among the people who spent the week end at The Peninsula.

Mr. P. B. Hammond and Mr. Roy A. Silent, prominent Los Angeles business men, were registered at The Peninsula recently.

Mrs. C. N. Buckler and Mrs. M. Stevenson of El Paso, Texas, are summer guests at The Peninsula.

Mr. and Mrs. H. V. Ramsdell went down in their car last week for a few days of golf and motoring at beautiful Del Monte.

Lieutenant-Commander Henderson of Mare Island is at Del Monte with Mrs. Henderson and Mr. Urban Cronan of New Haven. Lieutenant-Commander Henderson is a fine golfer and during his leave of absence will probably do some very clever work on the Del Monte links.

Mrs. M. A. Cachot returned during the week from a three months' tour of the Orient, and has re-established herself in her apartment at the Hotel Victoria.

Mr. and Mrs. F. W. Lindies are spending their honeymoon among the roses at Del Monte.

Dr. and Mrs. James Porter Mills, Miss Olive Mackenzie, Miss Lilian Dartbery, Miss Mary Beresford, all of London, motored down from the Palace last week and will be for some time at Del Monte.

Mrs. Fountain Finnell and her son sailed on the Korea on Wednesday for the Orient where they are to spend three months. Mrs. Finnell and her son have been guests at the Hotel Victoria during the winter.

Dr. and Mrs. Thomas Addeson of Berkeley motored down to the Vendome for the week end.

Mr. Ellis B. Hayman of London and Mr. and Mrs. J. Stewart of London are making a month's stay at the Vendome.

Mrs. Fletcher Ryer was hostess at a delightful luncheon on Tuesday in the grey room of the Fairmont Hotel. Twelve guests assembled around the flower laden table which was set in the main dining room overlooking the bay. Among those present were Mrs. Robert Hayes Smith, Miss Celia O'Connor, Miss Lillie O'Connor, Miss Virginia Jolliffe and Miss E. Marion Warren.

The list of arrivals at Highland Springs for the week ending May 25 included the following from San Francisco: Mrs. M. A. Kennedy, C. E. Kennedy, Mr. and Mrs. R. V. Whitney, Miss R. Kay, Mrs. E. G. Wheeler, E. M. Gillette, Miss Hecht, J. Hecht, L. P. Signor, L. N. Swartz, F. Bochman, N. C. Babin, A. C. Wolf, Col. R. D. Fry, E. Carrigan, Chas. Day, A. A. Allen, I. Elexander, Mrs. Wm. Boyken, A. W. Boyken, Mr. and Mrs. M. A. Samuel, H. C. Bruver and N. Crocker.

HOME SHUT OFF FROM CITY'S CLAMOR

The residence pictured is the property of Attorney Thomas C. Warren and is located on McAdam street in Rock Ridge Park. It is placed among sylvan surroundings, where the warmth of the California sunshine makes climatic conditions perfect for the enjoyment of home life.

The charm of the surroundings, the short distance from business and yet the complete obliteration of all suggestion of business life from the home place is to be found throughout Rock Ridge. It is hard to realize that the owner of such a home leaves his office at Fourteenth and Broadway in the heart of the business district of a great city, and after a ride for fifteen minutes on the street car, a part of the trip over the green golf links of the Claremont Country Club, walks 458 feet to his own doorway.

RESIDENCE OF THOMAS C. WARREN

Mr. Warren and wife, formerly Miss Bernice Oudsley of Berkeley, will occupy this new home in Rock Ridge about the middle of the week.

The Disinterment of "Trilby"

"Trilby" awoke at the Alcazar this week after a sleep of many years. Having slept the sleep of the wornout in the tomb of dead dramas it awoke to sluggish vitality, its blood thinned to anemia and its pulses beating a slow and feeble measure. "Trilby" is not what it used to be. It has not retained the energy transfused into it from the Du Maurier story. Its joints are stiff with premature old age and its crotchets have alienated the sympathy which would have been extended gladly if the years had ripened and mellowed it. But the years have dealt unkindly with "Trilby," so unkindly that it would have been better to let the play sleep undisturbed with others cut off in their none too vigorous prime. "Trilby" is sweeter as a memory than as a resurrection. It would be pleasanter to read its epitaph than to write of its revival. Its epitaph was prettily inscribed in words that breathed amenity with as much veracity as usually abides in epitaphs. Pausing by its tomb we would have been minded to speak no ill of the dead. We would have dropped a tear to the memory of the dear departed. Perhaps we might have breathed a prayer for the repose of the soul of Du Maurier who afforded us so much entertainment in the days that are gone. But "Trilby" has been rudely taken from its resting place. It seems that it was not dead but sleeping. So, at least, the Alcazar management thought. Whether it walks as a living thing or a ghost, it is not the "Trilby" of old. It smells of mortality, its cerements tell of a departed fashion. Yet does the fragrance of recollection linger in our nostrils. Alas, the "Trilby" of Evelyn Vaughan and Landers Stevens is not the "Trilby" of Mary Van Buren and Wilton Lackaye, the "Trilby" of my particular recollection. Svengali lived in Wilton Lackaye; in Landers Stevens he is a caricature. Where is the terrible hypnotic eye, the sinister clawlike finger, the diabolical laugh? Gone bevond the power of Landers Stevens to summon them. There were greater Trilbys than Mary Van Buren, but I never saw a lovelier. Miss Vaughan is a pretty Trilby but no more. She is listless, uninteresting, a figure for the background. Svengali would have scorned to conquer so yielding a subject. The weakling Gecko might have hypnotised her. I remember Theodore Roberts as Taffy, a fine figure of a man and an actor of parts, as we all know. Will Walling plays Taffy well. I remember too the only Zou Zou in the world, Ignace Martinetti. A man of sentiment might shed tears over that memory, seeing Maurice Stewart. Where, oh where is Ignace Martinetti? Bennison's Laird was not bad, though his Scotch was not conducive to clear enunciation, or perhaps the whiskers were to blame. Garwood's Little Billie lacked distinction. Burt Wesner's Rev. Thomas Bagot was a joy in facial expression. It is so seldom that I have seen Adele Belgarde in any but fashion plate clothes that her Mme. Vinard aroused no critical impulse. Her duds have always been more important than her acting. It is too bad that Miss Vaughan should have chosen "Trilby" for her farewell. She might easily have made a better selection, one that would have allowed her to do justice to her talents. In the long and imposing list of Alcazar leading women Miss Vaughan takes an honored place. The Alcazar belongs to San Francisco history more peculiarly than any other theater and Miss Vaughan may be sure that she will have a page. That is a great deal for any actress. I do not know Miss Vaughan's plans but I am sure that her career at the Alcazar will open many managerial doors that might otherwise have stayed shut. But if I might offer her a bit of advice I would tell her to let "Trilby" return to its resting place. Even the beautiful "Ben Bolt" cannot keep it fresh and sweet.

—Edward F. O'Day.

Max Beerbohm's Marriage

It now appears that a romance is the explanation of Max Beerbohm's retirement from the post of dramatic critic of the Saturday Review of London. At least that is the reason given out, though it does not appear why married life should incapacitate Mr. Beerbohm from passing judgment on plays. Perhaps Mr. Beerbohm thinks that critics should be bachelors. At any rate it is announced that he is to marry Miss Florence Kahn of Tennessee, an American actress. That Max Beerbohm should fall a victim to the charms of an American actress is surely the irony of fate, for he has never expressed very high opinions of any American actors or actresses. In fact he has expressed rather contemptuous opinions of our theater whenever the opportunity offered. Miss Kahn is favorably known for her interpretations of Ibsen and Sudermann heroines. She was once leading lady for the late Richard Mansfield. She made her London debut about two years ago. It would be interesting to look up in the files what Max Beerbohm said about her on that occasion. A good story is told of Beerbohm's first interview with the editor of the Saturday Review. When he succeeded Bernard Shaw as dramatic critic the editor informed him what salary "G. B. S." had been receiving, and added, "Of course, being comparatively inexperienced, you can scarcely expect as much." "Oh, yes, I shall," replied Max. "Indeed, I shall expect more! You see, as Shaw knows the drama thoroughly it was perfectly easy for him to write about it. Now, as I know nothing about it, it will be awfully hard work."

Virginia Harned at the Alcazar

Virginia Harned's five-weeks' engagement in the Alcazar commences next Monday evening with an elaborate presentation of "Anna Karenina," dramatized from Tolstoi's famous novel by Edmund Guiraud and translated for the English stage by Thomas William Broadhurst. The play begins when Anna, wife of Alexis Karenin, meets Vronsky, a cavalry officer, and they suddenly manifest interest in each other. In the second act, showing a race course, Vronsky confesses his love and when she repels him he rides recklessly in a steeplechase and is hurt. Her anxiety shows her husband where her affection has wandered and by telling her that Vronsky is dead he leads her to confess her love. When she discovers that Karenin has lied to her she leaves him and he uses their little son as a bait to bring her back, refusing to permit her to obtain a divorce. In the third act Anna and Vronsky have eloped to Venice and are living as man and wife. Realizing that her reputation has suffered and learning that Vronsky is eager to rejoin his regiment, she decides to return to Russia and make another effort at securing legal separation from her husband. While clandestinely visiting her son she is discovered and driven from the house by Karenin. Vronsky's home, near Moscow, is the scene of the final act. Anna is beginning to realize that Vronsky is tiring of her, and when she is reliably informed that Karenin has finally consented to a divorce she understands that Vronsky no longer wishes to marry her. He goes away, in opposition to her desire, and she throws herself in front of a railway train just before he returns to ask her forgiveness. This is said to be one of the most thrilling stage effects ever conceived. In the cast are twenty-eight speaking characters, and each of the five acts has an elaborate setting. William Courtenay will be seen as Vronsky, a part which he has played many times and Will R. Walling as Karenin.

Vesta Victoria is coming to the Orpheum next week. She is without doubt the most famous and popular singing comedienne that has visited New York. Several years ago she was brought to this country by the late Tony Pastor and her biggest song hit in those days was "Daddy, Won't You Buy Me a Bow-Bow?" which became popular through the land. More recently she scored tremendously with "Waiting at the Church" and "Poor John" and for her first season in this city she promises quite a number of new song sensations. The "Code Book" will be presented by Messrs. Hammond and Atwell. It is a one-act play telling of the efforts of Colonel Nakumura of the Japanese War Bureau of Information to obtain copies of the signals and information contained in the Code Book which is kept in every United States Recruiting Station. De Witte Kaplan and Herbert Walter are the authors. Mr. Walter is a native of this city. Paul Spadoni, the juggler, is another attraction. Lyons and Yosco, the harpist and the singer, will appear in a musical act. Mrs. Richard Rees, one of the best of our local sopranos, will make her vaudeville debut and will be heard in several favorite songs.

Collier at the Columbia

William Collier will present "A Lucky Star" at the Columbia Theater for two weeks beginning Monday evening. Collier is too well and favorably known to San Francisco audiences to require any introduction. His clever portrayals in such successes as 'Caught in the Rain," "On the Quiet," "The Dictator" and "The Patriot" gave him high rank as a farceur. In his latest success Mr. Collier, it is said, is seen to better advantage than in any previous offering. The scenes of the play are all laid in Holland and the characters are Dutch. English, Scotch and American. Mr. Collier's company is a large one and exceedingly capable.

Idora Attractions

Ohlmeyer's big military band will swing into its final week at Idora Park tomorrow. Sousa maches and military music are proving exceedingly popular and during the last three weeks "the park beautiful" has been thronged with music lovers. As an added attraction during the final week of Ohlmeyer, Florence Drake Le Roy, the well known soprano soloist will sing at every concert, both afternoon and evening. Miss Le Roy appeared last season at Idora with the Conway band and won unstinted praise. From the scenic railway at one end of the grounds to the witches' den the concessions continue to furnish amusement for the merrymakers every afternoon and evening.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—Securities have been without marked feature in the recent week, fluctuations being within a comparatively narrow limit. The tendency however has been somewhat toward betterment as a result of a good absorption of some of the leading stocks on recent declines. The real factor for better sentiment among influential interests has been a distinctly favorable turn of affairs in the great crop country where ample rains have prevailed recently and warmer weather is in evidence. A heavy decline in wheat, corn and cotton has been the result, removing a dangerous situation in the commodity markets of the country. The official announcement of the placing of over sixty million dollars of American bonds with French investors and the probability of other large sums being taken in the near future, were important factors in banking circles and mark a new era in international affairs financially. Banking syndicates continue to hold aloof from market operations, awaiting a further advancement in the crop situation and the putting through by Congress of the railroad bill. It seems unlikely that these interests will participate in any market operations until the earlier part of June when conditions will be more propitious. We feel conservatively bullish on the outlook for stocks and we believe commitments should be made on any moderate recessions.

Wheat—There was no mistaking the trend of the wheat market during the past week, prices having been on the down grade from the start and the week wound up in the collapse of the much advertised May wheat deal. There have been many factors to account for the liquidation in all options. The weakness in the outside markets, the poor flour demand and the made-to-order weather were too much for the bulls. Early in the week several cargoes of wheat came down from Duluth to be delivered on contract. When the scattered outside long interest saw how easy it would be for the bears to deliver the actual wheat they deserted the big bull leader and prices collapsed. The ideal growing weather and the elimination of the church bug as well as the hessian fly has added millions of bushels to an already increased acreage which will no doubt give us the largest wheat crop on record. Of course the spring wheat has not yet been made but is so far advanced that with normal conditions the crop promises to be a bumper one. The foreign situation is decidedly weak. Liverpool prices are below ours for the July option. With good crops everywhere it will be hard to bull this market even after a decline of 16 cents.

Corn—The break in wheat prices was an added bear factor in a market already weak. Receipts have been quite liberal and the demand has been limited. Foreign news is generally bearish and there are no signs of an export business at this level. Weather, while a little too cool, has on the whole been quite favorable. The corn has all been seeded and the ground has had plenty of moisture. With warmer weather the growing crop will make rapid progress. Farmers are showing a willingness to market their corn even at this decline and a further decline can be looked for.

Cotton—It is estimated that from 350,000 to 370,000 bales of cotton will be received on the month contracts by the end of May. This will be the largest volume of transactions in May futures for any year on record. Ordinarily concentration of so large a quantity of cotton in one market at this stage of the season would tend to depress prices. In this case however that has been largely prevented by continuous sales to mills for domestic distribution and for export from week to week on a scale quite unusual for the New York trade. Even the most bearishly inclined hardly expected May to pass out without a good bulge. Instead May sold off, in fact around low point. Even the Miss Giles report on estimated cotton conditions which is usually close to that made by the United States Government had no marked effect. Precedent does not show that any of these reports has more than a temporary or sentimental effect. Although a great many reports continue to give unfavorable conditions for the new crop and little or no increased acreage in a great many southern States, yet one and all agree that Texas will show a bumper crop. One good authority writes us as follows: 'I have been in all sections of Texas during the last week or two and had a good chance to study the cotton situation. The acreage is very much larger than last year and the plant looks healthy and clean. The people in Texas predict the largest cotton crop in years. With another rain about June 15 and July 1 Texas will make more cotton than they will be able to pick. I interviewed an English cotton buyer at Gainesville, Texas. He said spinners are not buying any cotton to speak of, because they expect a big crop and look for ten cents, probably eleven cents, but not higher." He then recites numerous other instances that tend to confirm our old opinion that October and December cotton will sell at or under 11 cents.

Copper—Copper shares, both on the New York stock exchange and New York curb in the past week, have been a little stronger on account of the continued strength of the price of electrolytic copper. Statistics that come to hand regarding the consumption and production of copper continue to be extremely favorable for the producing companies for they show that the consumption in the United States is at the rate of seventy million pounds per month and that European consumption is at the rate of fifty million pounds, which just about balance the present rate of production, i. e., one hundred and twenty million pounds per month in the United States. As spring business continues to grow the consumption of copper appears to be increasing steadily, though rather slowly. As near as can be learned the producers are fairly well sold up. It is expected by many in the trade that the copper producers' statement in June will make a favorable showing compared with the April report. A substantial increase over last month in the European exports for May is looked for. Considering the conditions and general outlook for copper we see no reason for changing our former idea that we will in the near future see a better market for the good standard copper stocks. Generally speaking the market seems a purchase at the present level.

rived at the Mission of Santa Inez, at the foot of the mountain, about two o'clock p. m. We had ridden twenty-two miles.

Father Rubio had a good dinner provided for us while we dried ourselves by a roaring fire, and we soon were making ourselves very comfortable over the Padre's excellent California wine. As the weather was very tempestuous, and our guide wanted to procure an extra horse at the College Farm, distant about three miles, we determined to remain where we were till the next day. Everything about this Mission, except the old church building, is in a state of sad decay. There are still there, however, the vestiges of fine improvements built by the Indians in the palmy days of the church in California; and I observed among other things, the ruins of what was once a splendid aqueduct, built of brick, and the shattered remnants of an extensive grist-mill. At a distance, however, the general appearance of the Mission of Santa Inez is still imposing, and it is only upon a nearer approach that the marks of ruin become painfully apparent. There is still a splendid domain, containing many leagues of land, connected with the Mission. It is the property of the church, and under the supervision of Archbishop Allemany, whose agent is Doctor Nicholas A. Den.

There is also a school here for boys, under the management of a Mr. Campbell, formerly of Philadelphia. There were but twelve scholars in it, however, at the time of our visit. Three of them were nephews of the Hon. Pablo De la Guerra, and three of them sons of Mrs. Robbins, from whom, it will be remembered, I obtained food when starving back of Santa Barbara. The boys all spoke English with but slight Spanish accent, and when the little fellows discovered that I was the wanderer of whom they had heard, they were untiring in their efforts to please me.

On Sunday, the fifteenth, after the Padre had finished the morning services in the chapel, he gave me a letter to the Mission of San Juan in Monterey County, in case I should need assistance when I got there, and after dinner we departed for "Los Alamos." A great part of the road was very bad and it rained hard the entire distance. Just as night set in we arrived, very cold and wet, at our destination. Alighting, we sent in by the guide the letter with which Don Antonio De la Guerra had furnished Captain Reese, and presently we were ushered into a very comfortable apartment where a bright fire was blazing and were introduced to the family, which, including children and grand-children, numbered some twenty-six persons. At this place we were treated very hospitably. After supper one of the family played and sung for us, and, when we were shown to our room, we discovered that the lady of the house had surrendered her own to us as being probably the most comfortable she had. Several Americans were about the place, and partly on this account and because we wished to make San Luis Obispo in one ride, distance about fifty miles, we left the next morning without stopping to take coffee. We breakfasted as we rode along on pinoli and California cheese, a supply of which the guide appeared to have had ever since he left the College Farm at Santa Inez.

About noon we stopped at a place called the Guadalupe Ranch, and dined on jerked beef without bread or salt. We rested about an hour and again took the road. Owing to the misfortune of being led the wrong road by our guide, we did not reach San Luis Obispo that night, but were compelled to stop ten miles short of that place, long after dark, hungry, wet and weary, at the ranch of a gentleman of the name of John Price, Esq. This gentleman has been in the country some thirty years. Owing to the lateness of the hours, and our being strangers to him, it was some time before he would consent to accommodate us for the night. Finally, by dint of persuasion, and telling over the names of my friends among the old Californians, with whom he was acquainted, I succeeded in opening his heart, and he admitted us. He gave us some excellent whiskey, good beds and plenty of grain for our horses. He was quite inquisitive as to our business in the lower country, and in reply to his questions, we told him that we had come down from San Francisco in the steamer to attend to some business in connection with the sale of some land, but that, being detained till after the steamer had started, we were making the best of our way back by land, having important matters to attend to at Sacramento before the fourth of March; which latter part of the story was literally true. After a comfortable night's rest we partook of an excellent breakfast, and on offering to pay our host for his accommodation he declined taking recompense for anything except the barley our horses had eaten. Bidding Mr. Price good-bye, we resumed our journey, but owing to a rather late start, did not reach San Luis Obispo until about ten o'clock a. m.

Remembering that I had been identified in that place on my journey down the country, I did not care to pass through it, and so endeavored to go around by a very rough and hilly road. Observing that our movements were watched in the outset by persons about town, we thought it was best that the Captain should ride at once into the place and purchase some cigars, sardines, etc., and, in the event of any one identifying him, to say that we were looking for a lost horse. Accordingly he rode through the town, stopping to make his purchases, and on joining me on the other side, he said he had been recognized by a man to whom he had told the story agreed upon, and had no further trouble. We rode on about two miles further, when we stopped and turned our horses out to graze while we sat down on our blankets and enjoyed a luncheon and a smoke. After resting about an hour we again took the road and with nothing further occurring, about the middle of the afternoon reached the Rancho of Santa Margarita, distant but twelve miles from San Luis Obispo, where we concluded to stop for the night. This rancho is the property of Senor Joaquin Estrada. It has been a Mission, but the old building is now used as a sort of restaurant. One of the brothers of our host had married into the De la Guerra family, and on discovering that we were acquainted with Don Pablo, he treated us with marked hospitality. We had an excellent supper and good beds. At this place I found an Irishman who had seen Reese in Santa Barbara, and I judged from the way he looked at me that he knew me. He talked a great deal about McGowan and his persecutors. Being pretty well posted on that subject I joined freely in the conversation, and finally told him that I had seen McGowan at the house of Doctor Den, at which place I understood he had been, since leaving Santa Barbara. This appeared to satisfy him that I was not the "ubiquitous." Whether he knew me or not was of very little moment, for I felt sure from his conversation that he was an out and out anti Vigilante. He finished the conversation by saying that McGowan could not be the monster he had been represented, or Doctor Den would not have sheltered him so long as he had done. In this opinion I of course acquiesced, and shortly afterward we all retired for the night.

The next morning after breakfast we again took up our line of travel, and rode on without stopping until we came to the hot spring, mentioned in my journey down the country. Here we halted and took a pleasant bath and luncheon. We let our horses feed a short time, while we rested and smoked our cigars, and then rode on as far as the Mission of San Miguel where we halted for the night. Notwithstanding the Mexican who keeps the place had informed us before alighting that there was feed for the horses, when he had unsaddled them we discovered that there was not a particle for them to eat about the premises. Here was a quandary. To turn them loose to graze was out of the question, as the place was infested with a parcel of Indians who had a trick of stampeding the horses of travelers for the purpose of getting the reward usually offered for their recovery. It was at this place, I remembered, that young Castro had lost a horse in this manner, on the downward journey. I had the horses securely locked up, and then set about trying to buy some corn for them from the Indians. I managed, after hard work, to induce an old Indian to sell me a dollar's worth by bribing him with a drink of brandy. This was but short allowance for four tired horses, but we were compelled to be contented with it.

The fellow who kept this place was a surly brute, and evidently mistook us for robbers. When we first alighted the members of the household, including several Senoritas, were assembled in the main building, but on seeing us he drove them at once out of sight. Having distributed their scanty allowance among the horses, we entered the house and sat down to a miserable supper which we attempted to wash down with some villainous claret. After supper we were shown to a kind of cell in the old building, where, on dirty beds, we passed a most uncomfortable night. As soon as it was light I arose and went out with the guide among the Indians to endeavor to procure some more corn for the horses. For some time my efforts were unsuccessful. I showed them money, but they said they did not care for any of it; they had no corn to sell. I had a bottle of good brandy left, and traveling at that season of the year I would not have parted with it for five dollars. Nevertheless, if money would not do, the brandy had to go rather than the horses should go unfed. My eye fell on a good-looking young Indian leaning against a door-post and listlessly looking at us. I asked him in Spanish if he would not like a drink of cognac. He replied "very much"; whereupon I told him if he would get me the corn I would give him the bottle and pay him beside. He entered the house and after a noisy altercation with an old hag, returned with a serape half filled with corn and acorns. I gave him the bottle and some silver, and he and an old Indian, who appeared to be his father, finished the liquor in two drinks. We then bought some sardines from the Mexican who kept the place and left it in extreme disgust. I cannot conscientiously advise any one who may travel that road to stop at the Rancho of San Miguel. The cross-grained varlet who keeps it, is but a poor specimen of a California Boniface. He not only charges three prices for all that he sells, but treats his guests all the time as if by so doing he was conferring an immense favor on them.

After riding some eight or ten miles we came to a small stream, which, in order to cross, we were obliged to swim. Here we found several parties encamped on both sides of the stream; they had wagons and among them were several women. They had arrived respectively from the north and south the previous night, and had waited until morning in the hope that some one would come along and show them the best crossing place. I told the guide, supposing that he was most accustomed to that sort of thing, to go in first; but, being a very timid man, he hesitated. Presently, however, to cut the matter short, Captain Reese plunged in with his horse, and the guide and I following, we all reached the other side in safety. The wagons then followed, but the mules became entangled in the harness, in the middle of the stream, and a young Spaniard, who afterward told me he was from Martinez on his way to Los Angeles, went to the rescue of the women, and crossed them over safely, one by one, on a fine little mare he had with him. I gave this young fellow a box of sardines and some of our claret, in return for which he treated us to some hot coffee, some of his Indians had just made. We unsaddled our horses and let them feed, while we breakfasted and took a smoke. After an hour's rest we resumed our journey, and traveled, without stopping, until we reached the Rancho of San Benito. We had been told, at Santa Margarita, that we should find good entertainment at this place, and we were not disappointed.

The proprietor is Mr. Thomas Watson, an American gentleman who has resided in Monterey County some thirty years, and has a large family of sons and daughters, one of the latter of whom is the wife of E. L. Williams, Esq., County Clerk of Monterey. We did not have the pleasure of seeing the proprietor himself, but his son, Thomas Watson Jr., entertained us very handsomely. Shortly after we entered the house I saw a gentleman who, I ascertained, was a deputy sheriff of Santa Cruz County and had been at the ranch several days. Not caring to be much in his company, for reasons which will be understood, and, beside, being very weary, I retired early. I had not been asleep long when I was awakened by two men entering the room. One of them, whom I recognized as the sheriff, had his face blacked. This circumstance puzzled and somewhat alarmed me. At the same time I heard him remark—"It would be funny if they were to steal my horses, and I am to leave tomorrow." Presently he washed his face and he and his companion again went out. I lay awake for some time wondering what the blacking of his face could mean, but finally coming to the conclusion that it probably had no connection with me, yet still very curious as to the mystery, I fell asleep.

After breakfast the next morning, we were informed that the sheriff, who was on his way to Santa Cruz, two days' journey on the road we were traveling, would embrace the opportunity of having company, and ride with us. I did not like the idea much, as the face blacking of the previous night was still unexplained. I was fearful that he was on the look-out for me, but had as yet failed to identify me. I knew that a letter had been very foolishly written from Santa Barbara to San Francisco, to an indiscreet friend there, apprising him of my intended journey to the Capital, and I feared that he would inform every one of the fact, and thus perhaps, unintentionally have me intercepted. Indeed, I afterward discovered that he had circulated the news far and wide, but fortunately, those who ought not to have known it did not believe it, a statement having appeared about that time in the San Francisco Herald, that a passenger, recently arrived in a ship from Canton, had seen me in that place. I presumed if the Committee contemplated capturing me, that between this point and Stockton would be the most likely place they would undertake it. Therefore, considering everything, I felt by no means pleased at this addition to our company. There was nothing for it, however, but to ride off boldly with the sheriff, which we did.

Happily, however, we had not gone far before my apprehensions were relieved. The sheriff, who proved to be a very pleasant, companionable man, accounted for the mystery of the previous night, by telling me he had been engaged with the young ladies in a game called "smut," and having been beaten, had submitted to the penalty and had his face blacked. This gentleman's name is Charles Williams, Esq., and he is a brother of the above mentioned county clerk. We had that day a very pleasant ride, and arrived early in the afternoon at the Mission Soledad, where we halted for the night. I recognized the keeper of this place, whom I had not seen on my way down. His name was Harris, and he was formerly bartender at the "Willows," a resort well known to San Franciscans. He did not know me, however, I was so much altered, having lost forty pounds of flesh since he had last seen me. He desired us to register our names in his book, and I wrote mine as "Samuel Chapman." I procured from him writing materials and addressed a letter to a gentleman at Monterey named Charles Harron, Esq., an old Philadelphia friend, informing him of my journey to the Capital. I knew that he was discreet, and my only object in writing was to have the pleasure of once more communicating with an old friend.

We were very comfortably quartered at the Soledad, and the next morning after breakfast, prepared to renew our journey. We were told before starting that a few miles from the Mission we should come to a stream which at that season was impassable, owing to the quick-sands, unless we were fortunate enough to find an old Indian who lived about there, and induce him to show us the firm footing. Both the Sheriff and Harris were of the opinion that we had better go another road which was thirty miles longer, the chances being against our finding the Indian. As thirty miles, however, was a great item to tired horses, I thought it was best to go on to the stream and take the chance of finding the Indian. After some consultation this plan was adopted and we started for the stream, where we were fortunate enough to find the Indian, and at last by dint of silver and coaxing, and above all some whiskey, we were safely landed on the opposite bank.

Here we found a party of travelers with wagons, waiting for some one to guide them across the river. Some horsemen were riding in front of the wagons armed with rifles, and for a moment I fancied that they might be my old friends the Vigilantes, and prepared for an attack. I soon saw, however, that one of the wagons contained a woman, and was reassured as to the character of the party. The sheriff was acquainted with one of them and stopped a moment to converse, while I

A Storekeeper Says:

"A lady came into my store lately and said:

"'I have been using a New Perfection Oil Cook-Stove all winter in my apartment. I want one now for my summer home. I think these oil stoves are wonderful. If only women knew what a comfort they are, they would all have one. I spoke about my stove to a lot of my friends, and they were astonished. They thought that there was smell and smoke from an oil stove, and that it heated a room just like any other stove. I told them of my experience, and one after another they got one, and now, not one of them would give hers up for five times its cost.'"

The lady who said this had thought an oil stove was all right for quickly heating milk for a baby, or boiling a kettle of water, or to make coffee quickly in the morning, but she never dreamed of using it for difficult or heavy cooking. Now—she knows.

Do you really appreciate what a New Perfection Oil Cook-Stove means to you? No more coal to carry, no more coming to the dinner table so tired out that you can't eat. Just light a Perfection Stove and immediately the heat from an intense blue flame shoots up to the bottom of pot, kettle or oven. But the room isn't heated. There is no smoke, no smell, no outside heat, no drudgery in the kitchen where one of these stoves is used.

rode on. I learned when he rejoined us that they were on their way to the lower country to purchase brood mares, intending to take them through Mexico to Texas, and that they hoped to accomplish the trip in one hundred days. The animals can be procured at very low prices on this side, and, if safely got through the journey, command a handsome profit. At noon we stopped to eat something and let our horses graze. As we were now within thirty miles of San Juan in the Salinas Plains, up to which point the Sheriff knew the road well, and beyond it we did not need a guide, I determined here to despatch Jose back to Doctor Den. Accordingly I gave him a letter for the Doctor, letting him know how we got on; and, taking with him two of the horses, the guide started back.

After he had gone, the Sheriff loaned me one of his fresh horses, and we galloped on our journey. We stopped at one or two places to get water, one of which was the ranch of the Mexican who had been so near being shot for a deserter, at whose house it will be remembered I passed a night on my journey from San Francisco. His wife recognized me, but he did not till he saw her smile at me, and then he too remembered me. He asked me many questions, and I told him that since he had seen me I had been in Mexico. I doubted, however, from his looks whether he believed the story. It mattered little, however, for of course, he was ignorant of my name, and we stayed but a few moments at his door. After riding a few miles further we came to a place called the Canada Verda, where, to oblige the Sheriff, we stopped a little while to give him an opportunity to see a friend on business. This gentleman was the Judge of the Plains, and I knew him the moment I saw him. It was Don Manuel A. Castro. He had represented San Luis Obispo the previous year in the Legislature, and it was at the Capital I had seen him. As he did not recognize me, however, I did not accost him.

A few miles further on, we came to the store of Mr. Johnstone where we halted for the night. This gentleman came to California during the war, as a member of Colonel Stevenson's regiment. I had known him before, when he was employed in the office of P. K. Woodside, Esq., at that time Clerk of the Supreme Court. He did not appear to recognize me, however, and I did not that night make myself known to him, although I knew he was a Democrat of the right stripe, and had no fears as to his discretion.

We were very comfortably accommodated at this place, and in the morning as we were about to start I paid all the bill, including the Sheriff's who had so kindly loaned me his horse, and who I knew, having been some time absent from home had paid away his last dollar at the Soledad. Here the Sheriff was to part from us, he being within a few miles of his home and our roads lying from this point in different directions. Accordingly we bid him God speed, and saw him off. As I was about mounting I observed Johnstone eyeing me very closely. He seemed to know me, and yet was in uncertainty where he had seen me. He had a bottle of whiskey in his hand which I suspected he wanted to give me. Knowing that it would be perfectly safe, I at length asked him if he did not know me. He said he knew me very well but could not for his life say who I was. I told him and he seized my hand and pressed it very hard. He asked me why I had not stopped at his place on my way down the coast. Dennison, with whom I then was, had been a fellow soldier with him, and had stopped at his door where I took a drink but did not dismount, and hence he had not recognized me. He gave me the bottle of whiskey, and wishing me a safe journey saw me off.

It was Sunday morning, and as we approached the town of San Juan, we thought it safer, as many persons would probably be there from the country, not to pass through the place. So we avoided it by a mountain road to the right, and sent the letter which Father Rubio had given us, to the Priest at the Mission, by a man whom we found cutting wood, and who told us he knew him. A few miles further brought us to the Pacheco Pass, through which we were to strike into the interior and shape our course in a northeasterly direction to Stockton. At the foot of the mountain we saw a small ranch, and on being informed by some women whom we saw gathering mushrooms that we could get quarters for ourselves and horses for the night, we concluded to finish here our day's ride.

The person who kept this place looked familiar to me, and I soon identified him as a stage driver I had known on the road between San Francisco and San Jose, named Harper. He and his partner had each married a French woman, and settled down in this romantic spot, where they were farming, and raising a few stock. We had a good supper and comfortable lodging, and started early the next morning before breakfast to cross the mountain by the Pacheco Pass. It is seven miles over the pass, and the road is perfectly good and passable for wagons at all seasons of the year. It was constructed by a Mr. Firebaugh, under a franchise granted him for a term of years by the Legislature for that purpose. He has the privilege of keeping a toll-gate, which is situated at his house on the summit. About a mile and a half from the gate we met Mr. Firebaugh in company with a workman superintending some repairs in the road. We paid him our toll and asked him if we could be accommodated with breakfast at the house. He told us that his wife would prepare some for us, and accordingly on reaching the summit, we stopped. Here we saw Mrs. Firebaugh with her little son. She had apparently just arisen, and the Captain and I were both struck with her singular beauty and lady-like deportment. I could not help wondering how a lady so charming could content herself in so wild and out of the way a place as the Pacheco Pass. I should infer, however, from what little I observed of her that she is one of those rare and precious gifts in the shape of woman, whose happiness is in her husband, and whose paradise is his home. We informed her of what her husband had said about the breakfast, but at the same time declined to trouble her. The fire was not yet made, and before she should have put herself to the trouble of making it for me, I would have dispensed with breakfast every day for a week. She set before us a bottle of excellent whiskey of which we partook, but she declined receiving any pay. I gave her little son a small piece of money, and bidding her good morning, we resumed our journey. After riding about twelve miles we came to a large unfinished frame house. The people about this place appeared to be a mixture of French and Spaniards. I identified one of them as a San Francisco Frenchman, but he did not know me. I imagine he was but a visitor there. Here we took breakfast, and again mounting, rode on until we came to Hill's Ferry on the San Joaquin river, where we found a very good hotel, and stopped for the night. At this place, we fell in with a tall, cadaverous looking old fellow, who I judged from his conversation to be a squatter. He was accompanied by a young lad, and he told me they were looking out for a place to "locate." He said he had lived in the valley of San Jose. They were traveling on foot with one pack animal. He had been a lawyer he told me, and I should judge by his appearance and sanctified twang he had been a preacher too. After conversing with us some time, he and the lad made their bed on the floor and we retired to our room. After an early breakfast the next morning, we resumed our journey intending if possible, to reach the City of Stockton that night, but forty miles distant. It rained and stormed dreadfully, however, and, after riding about twenty miles, we were fain to ask shelter at a neat little cottage we espied on the roadside. This house was kept by a young Welshman and his wife, who lived very comfortably and were surrounded by a family of pretty little children. The gentleman's name is Griffith. We were hospitably welcomed, and a large fire was soon made for us at which we dried our clothes and blankets. We found here an old gentleman, named Major James Martin Lewis, familiarly known in that neighborhood as "Uncle Jemmy Lewis." He is a brother of Colonel Joel Lewis, so well and favorable known to the citizens of Sacramento. This old gentleman I have since learned, has lived seventy years, and had served as a sergeant under General Jackson during the Creek war. He was gazetted by that veteran for his gallantry in being the first man on the enemy's ramparts at the famous battle of the Horse Shoe. He knew me, though I did not recognize him. I suppose he called me to mind from the circumstance of my having once acted as the friend of his nephew, Doctor Dickson of Mississippi, in an unfortunate affair of honor, in which that gentleman fell. I did not know until after starting the next day, that the old gentleman had recognized me. I entered freely into conversation with Mrs. Griffith, and found her very intelligent and not a little inquisitive. She asked me why I had not stopped at a large hotel we had passed after leaving Hill's Ferry. I replied that I always preferred to stop where there was a lady, because I invariably found the accommodations better and neater. She looked very knowingly at me and told me that my dress and language did not correspond, and that for some reason I was traveling in disguise. I thought this was very strange, not knowing at the time that "Uncle Jemmy" had told them who I was, and making some joking reply, I changed the conversation. I also met at this place a gentleman of the name of Judge Seneca Dean. He is an uncle of Mrs. Julia Dean Hayne, the actress. At the table the conversation turned upon the "ubiquitous" Judge McGowan. Judge Dean stated that McGowan had been pointed out to him once in San Francisco. At this I observed a sly smile on the face of mischievous Mrs. Griffith. I however looked them full in the face, and continued my dinner as though McGowan was a personage in whom I felt no interest whatever. I told Judge Dean that I had business with the Legislature, and he gave me a letter to the member from Stanislaus, in which county we then were. In this letter he mentioned no name, but simply commended the bearer to the gentleman to whom it was written.

It rained incessantly all that day and night, and the next day at twelve o'clock we started for Stockton. I saw two persons approaching the house after I had mounted, and rode off first to avoid observation. Presently I was overtaken by Captain Reese, who told me that just as he was leaving "Uncle Jemmy" had said to him: "Young man, that is Judge McGowan. I know it is. Don't tell me any lies about it. I am his friend, and if danger threatens him let him come back here. I've a good double barrelled shot gun, and we'll protect him!"

Reese laughed, and bidding the gallant old fellow good-bye, rode away. I now understood the remarks of good Mrs. Griffith and Judge Dean.

Stockton was now but twenty-two miles off, and notwithstanding the roads were very bad, and it was raining very hard, we determined if possible to reach it that night. We pushed on without stopping, until we got to French Camp. Up to this point we had been enabled to travel at a pretty fair rate, but in traversing the five miles which intervened between it and Stockton, so wretched was the road that we were occupied full three hours. At length, some time after dark, wet, weary and cold, we rode into the good City of Stockton, and I felt after nine months of pilgrimage and banishment that I was once more really mingling with my fellow men.

On entering the town, Reese met a person with whom he was acquainted, and I requested him to inquire for the residence of Samuel Brooks, Esq., the County Treasurer of San Joaquin County. I had not the pleasure of an intimate personal acquaintance with Mr. Brooks, but I knew enough of his character to believe that, under the circumstances which then surrounded me, I might safely trust my life in his keeping. He was, however, spared the annoyance of my visit, for Reese was informed that he was absent in San Francisco

My next inquiry was for Col. John O'Neal, the County Clerk That gentleman soon appeared, and after congratulating me on my safe return, conducted us to a good place to stable our horses. He then accompanied us to the room of one of his friends and very kindly sent out and had a warm supper prepared and brought to us, which was very acceptable, as we had eaten but one meal that day. Many of my friends who resided in Stockton were now informed of my arrival, and before we retired for the night I was visited by several of them. I cannot convey any idea of the gratification I felt at finding myself congratulated and sympathized with by some of the first men of the State, notwithstanding the continuous stream of vilification and slander that had been poured over my name during my voluntary exile. It was to me a harbinger of happier days, and an assurance that not only my individual troubles were about ending, but that there still existed in the minds of the true men of the State sufficient respect for the Constitution and our laws to render their supremacy in the land once more certain, and that at no distant day.

The next morning I was visited by the Hon. Charles M. Creaner, District Judge of that Judicial District. He was very glad to see me safely returned to stand my trial, and when, in the course of our conversation, I asked him if he was not afraid, on account of his position, that he might be compromised by visiting me under such peculiar circumstances, "Sir," said he, "if I am to be compromised by extending the hand of sympathy to one who has been barbarously hunted by blood-hounds, the sooner the better." Such a sentiment fervently expressed by such a man, infused new life into me. Personally I was a comparative stranger to Judge Creaner. Although both of us were members of the same political party, we had sympathized and acted with opposite wings of that party, and there was very little more in common between us politically, than, from our slight acquaintance, there had been personally. When, therefore, I contrasted this language of the high toned Judge, with the pitiful cowardice, meanness and ingratitude of some of my friends, into whose nostrils I had blown the breath of political life, I could not but painfully learn and bitterly digest the lesson I was thus taught in human nature. The Judge, on learning my intention to proceed to Sacramento for the purpose of endeavoring to procure the passage of a law by which I might be safely and fairly tried under my indictment, very kindly furnished me with a letter to the Hon. A. R. Meloney, the Senator from that District, and, after a most agreeable visit, took his leave

He flinched from the question in her eyes.

"Yes, and no!" he said, helplessly.

"What does that mean?" she asked.

"There was another in my thoughts," he said, "but nothing more."

"I think I know who it is," she replied, "and I can't for the life of me understand what you can see in her."

For the first time, a faint smile flickered across the face of the man.

"I don't suppose you would," he said.

"But tell me what it is," she asked; "you are not the man to run after a pretty face."

"Potentialities," he replied.

"I see," she said, bitterly. "Just as you have made money in taking poor businesses and building them up, I suppose it was your idea to take some of us poor married women with 'potentialities,' and develop us."

The man ignored the tone of mockery in which this remark was made, and looked at her with undisguised admiration.

"You have expressed it beautifully," he said. "That is just the wit that so attracted me to you."

The distant murmur of voices in the hall reached them.

"We must say good-bye," he said; "I cannot stand much more."

She kissed him passionately, and ran out of the room without looking round; nor did she bid farewell to the wife, who looked after her with a sad and somewhat puzzled air.

The doctor looked in again.

"Your husband is having too much excitement," he said to the wife, "but I haven't the heart to refuse him his wish to see more friends; but do not let them stay alone with him longer than you can help, and let there be some interval between each visit."

In succession the dying man bade farewell to other friends and his only relative, his sister, who had hastened to the house.

He asked if his wife's cousin had come, and was informed that she had been there for some time, and was with his wife, who, unable to bear the strain any longer, had gone to her room

"Who is there besides Mrs. Wilson?" he asked.

"Mr. Armyn," was the reply.

"Ask him up," he said; "and when he has gone, ask Mrs. Wilson if she will come and see me; and I don't want to see anybody else except the mistress."

"Sit down, old man," he said, as his friend entered the room

"I have often thought you would come to say good-bye to me," said Armyn, "but never this. A man of fifty-five expects to go before a man born twenty years after him. What a cursed world it is! Now, if it had been an old bachelor like me, it would not have mattered, but you with a wife and children—! Everyone will be shocked. In the whole of our set you have always been held up as the model husband and father."

The dying man gazed at him with a look half-mocking, half-affectionate, but said not a word.

"Don't worry too much about money matters," proceeded the elder man; "if you don't leave enough for the wife and chicks I can do a bit there; I have enough and to spare, as you know."

"Armyn." The dying man said this in a tone that made his friend leap towards him. "I can't talk much more, and this is no time for beating about the bush. Mark what I say, and don't interrupt. You have made the silly mistake that so many men do who are born into a business; if they don't marry before they are forty they never do, and they are fools. In a few hours I shall be dead. There is enough money for the wife and children, so I am not thinking of that; but after a year or two, ask my wife to marry you; she will make you a good wife."

The elder man turned scarlet like a startled girl, and stammered out a protest, but his friend waved him out of the room with the word: "Remember!"

There was a knock at the door, and Enid Wilson entered. She bore traces of emotion.

"Enid," he said, "I want to talk to you. Is Frank here?"

"No," she replied, "I telephoned him, and I expect him here in an hour or two. I hope he will be—" she broke off

"'In time,' you were going to say, I suppose?"

She nodded.

"I want to have a talk with you," he said. "How often have we had a private conversation since you were married?"

"About four times, I suppose," she replied.

"That is about once every three years," he said. "I am afraid we shan't be able to improve the average much—not so much as I had hoped."

She shot a quick glance at him.

"I want to ask you two questions," he said. "Will you promise to answer them?"

"I don't know," she replied. "You must not get excited, and the doctor says I must not stay more than ten minutes with you. Surely you want to be alone the last hour or two with Ada and the children."

"Yes," he replied, "but I want you to answer two questions, and then I can die satisfied. You know," he said, and he looked her straight in the face—"Ada and I have been very happy together; from the beginning to the end."

"Yes," she replied. "Frank has always held you up as the model couple."

"Well, we have been happy," he said; "but in those quiet moments when a man looks into the recesses of his own heart he likes to toy with the thought of what might have been, and there is one question has always come to my mind."

"And that is—?"

He sat up and looked intently at her.

"Supposing I had asked you to marry me, which I very nearly did, would you have said 'Yes'?"

"That is not a fair question," she replied; "and you seem to forget that I have a husband." She walked to the window.

There was a short silence.

"I feel rather caddish," he said, "in using approaching death as a lever, but do you remember that evening on the river? It is three years ago last June?"

"You mean when Ada—?"

"Yes," he said, "I see you do. That evening I had a feeling which I am afraid will not come true; and I was going to ask you if you would—no, I can't say it now! Oh, this accursed accident!"

He closed his eyes and fell back on the pillows.

"Good-bye," he murmured.

She came to him, the tears streaming from her eyes, and kissed him tenderly.

"The answer to both questions would have been 'Yes.'" she said; and then she went from the room

* * * * * * * * * * *

Events took a strange turn, not only damaging to the doctor's reputation, but embarrassing to others: the man recovered!

"Doctor, you operated on that patient in No. 49, didn't you?"

"Yes."

"Make a successful job of it?"

"No, I didn't. The operation was disgustingly simple, and the man wasn't in the slightest danger at any time. The elaborate preparations I had made for handling a critical case were wholly wasted."

Auto Notes

W. H. Durphy, commercial vehicle expert, in a recent interview said: "The perfect working order of any gasoline engine depends upon each working part being properly lubricated. This means just enough oil as too much is fully as disastrous as too little. An expert chauffeur realizes this and acts accordingly. The inexperienced driver, however, has many accidents through carelessness or ignorance on this very point. Most often he allows a lead pipe to become plugged and access of oil is prohibited. The Chase Wagon is built primarily for the inexperienced driver and consequently a system had to be devised whereby these lubricating dangers would be obviated This was achieved by making the lubrication automatic. The oil and gasoline are mixed so that all the vapor is charged with the lubricant. Compression in the crank case forces this through all the bearings and the only requisite to proper lubrication is a running engine."

"Nothing so definitely demonstrates that the price asked for a car is justified by the value offered," said E. P. Brinegar, president of the Pioneer Automobile Co. in a recent conversation, "than the ability of the car to maintain that price year after year and at the same time experience a marked increase of demand. In a market where free competition is the rule an inevitable law forces prices to seek their proper level. In spite of the fact that the Lozier commands a higher average price than any other car made, it has enjoyed during the last two years an increase of business of 167 per cent—a greater percentage of increase than shown by any other of the seven leading cars which sell at $3.500 and over."

George P. Moore, Pacific Coast representative of Monogram oils, has just returned from a trip to Downieville, Sierra County, where he is interested in some mining prospects. Moore is very enthusiastic about this country and declares that among other things, it is fast becoming a resort for motorists. Only last year the San Francisco Motor Club sent the first pathfinder through this territory and put the roads on its map. Since then motoring interest has been on the increase and this spring finds numerous auto parties traveling through the vicinity. Although the roads are all mountainous, the grades with one or two exceptions, are gradual, and even on the steepest reasonable care of brakes is all that is necessary to safe automobiling.

J. W. Leavitt says that the Willys-Overland Company reports very satisfactory results for the foreign selling campaign recently instituted by them. Six Overland cars have been ordered during the past week for immediate delivery in the Philippine Islands and the Continental Motor Co. of Sydney has been appointed to represent the interest of the car in Australia.

Announcement has just been made that Chanslor, Lyon, the well known Auto Supply and Accessory firm, will establish a branch in Fresno in the near future. The location will be in J street and the establishment will be open for business by June 1. H. J. McCoy, manager of the local Chanslor, Lyon house, states that the Fresno concern will be stocked with a complete line of the firm's accessories and that it will be made a distributing basis for all the interior towns.

Although not given official notice a record was nevertheless made by a woman on the Los Angeles Motordrome. Mrs. Phil H. Lyon, one of the fair auto enthusiasts of the southern metropolis, drove a Buick "40" over the course for four miles, making three of them in 46 seconds flat each and the fourth in 47. It is safe to say that this is the fastest that any woman ever drove an automobile. Mrs. Lyons was as cool and collected throughout the run as a veteran driver.

Mrs. C. B. Bussell, owning a Columbus Electric Victoria, heads her letter to The Diamond Rubber Co.: "No tire trouble for three years." She further writes that a set of four 30x3½ Diamond Tires on her machine have been running since 1907 with the total trouble to date of one puncture. Needless to say, she is a believer in Diamond quality.

Mr. Harry C. Warwick, accompanied by his wife and son, took a recent fishing trip to the head waters of the Purissima, as a guest of the Hatch Lumber Co. Mr. Hatch stated that Mr. Warwick's Chalmers "40" was the first machine within two years that had been able to negotiate the roads of this section which are extremely poor and hilly. The Chalmers however made the whole trip without a single adjustment.

The Pioneer Automobile Company reports the sale of a Lozier touring car to Mr. L. E. Hanshett. This is the fourth Lozier car purchased by Mr. Hanshett in the last few months. He now has three Loziers on the coast, besides a Lozier of the Briarcliff type which he keeps for use when in New York.

LOZIER

Legitimately High-Priced

THE LOZIER MOTOR CAR has been for years past the highest priced of American cars. That it has been legitimately high priced is proven by its steady growth in popular favor among those whose experience with Motor Cars enables them to judge intelligently as to REAL AUTOMOBILE VALUE.

just completed a tour of the Sacramento Valley in his new Chalmers "30." Writing of the trip the Senator says: "The journey was made by way of Santa Rosa, Sonoma, Napa, Fairfield, Vacaville, Winters, Woodland and on to Colusa. The first day the run was made to Woodland, a distance of 161 miles, with the greatest east. Here the party remained over night and proceeded on to Colusa the next day. The return trip was made by way of Bartlett Springs to Bartlett Landing, to Upper Lake and to Lakeport, a distance of 84 miles, in a half day. From Lakeport the journey to Ukiah was concluded by way of Highlands to Hopland and thence to Ukiah. The distance traveled during the trip was 397 miles and not a mishap of any kind occurred. This car, the Chalmers "30," has now traveled over 1500 miles and no trouble has been experienced, whatever, not even a puncture."

Wm. Wagner, superintendent of the Motor Car Service Co., made a Sunday tour with a White Steam Car through Contra Costa County. Mrs. Wagner, the children, and Mr. and Mrs. Spring accompanied him on the trip. Wagner reports the tunnel road in especially fine touring condition and all the roads in the county in much better shape than they were last year.

S. C. Chapman reports the following deliveries made recently: Hupmobiles went to R. L. Doughlas and J. H. Kent, both of Fallon, Ore., J. C. Doolittle of San Mateo, I. G. Igeick of Orland, Miss Teal of Oakland and the Auto Livery Co. of Lakeview, Ore. The Auto Delivery Co. also received delivery of an Oakland "30" touring car. Mr. Sanborn of San Jose took an Oakland "30" roadster

The People of the State of California: To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described, or any part thereof, defendants, Greeting.

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Dora I. Walton, the above-named plaintiff, filed with the Clerk of the above entitled Court and County, within three months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property, or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

Commencing at a point on the Easterly line of Douglas Street, distant thereon One Hundred and Fifteen (115) feet Northerly from the Northerly line of Twenty-third Street; running thence Northerly along the said Easterly line of Douglas Street Fifty (50) feet; thence at right angles Easterly One Hundred and Thirty-four (134) feet and Three (3) inches; thence at right angles Southerly Fifty (50) feet, and thence at right angles Westerly One Hundred and Thirty-four (134) feet and Three (3) inches to the point of commencement. Portion of Horner's Addition Block Number Two Hundred and Sixteen (216).

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: The judgment of this Court establishing plaintiff's title to said real property and determining all adverse claims thereto, and declaring plaintiff to be the owner in fee simple absolute of all the above described real property and each and every part thereof free and clear of any liens or encumbrances, and for general relief and costs of suit.

Witness my hand and the Seal of said Court this 28th day of April, A. D. 1910. H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.

A Tommyrotic Novel

Victoria Cross can usually be depended on for some degree of cleverness, even if her morals are a minus quantity. She has been so long hailed as a genius that she has evidently come to believe it herself, and to assume that she may take liberties unreproved, for "The Eternal Fires" might well be the outcome of a wager that she could write the most absurdly tommyrotic romance of the century. Irene was celebrating her seventeenth birthday by sitting in the corner of the schoolroom and wondering why, having that morning engaged herself to marry Stephen Hall, she felt none of the thrills and ecstasies which she had expected from her perusal of novels and poems. Stephen himself, in the flesh, broke in upon her reverie, for Irene was a pupil-teacher in the school presided over by the father of her lover. Stephen was a very commonplace, materialistic young man whose ideas took the direction of home-making, the cost of furnishings and the provision for future little Halls, but Irene was all spirituality and ideality. Her chiefest joy was reading Pindar in Greek and wanting to know all about everything. Small wonder Stephen cut short his call, and left her dreaming to the accompaniment of heavenly music which heralded the approach of a god, Apollo, no less. He invited her to accompany him and without hesitation she went, out the window and up through space, to the heavenly mansions. There isn't much left to the imagination as to what went on there after Diana informed Irene of the honor to be conferred upon her—that she was to become the bride of Apollo, to accomplish a wonderful mission on earth and if she succeeded, to return and be immortal for ever and ever. Next morning attired in a sheet of sunlight tied on with a strip of rainbow, Apollo took his bride for a jaunt down the Milky Way in his golden chariot, where they jogged along at the moderate pace of two thousand miles an hour, and the god bestowed two kisses and a flower of Amaranth by way of wedding gifts, and any amount of advice which, however, doesn't appear to have been specially practical. Don't go to imagining that this is only a romantic dream. Not a bit of it, for when Irene awoke in her own room next morning she found herself without even the proverbial "stitch of clothing" on. Her everyday garments had evidently been left in the sky and the sheet of sunlight with its rainbow sash had taken unto themselves wings. Moreover, the bride of a night hied herself to London and consulted a high class specialist who charged her a fee of three guineas for confirming her hopes. Any way, Apollo had provided for contingencies by promising to dictate his poems to his wife, she, of course, to sell them for vulgar, earthly coin, but Apollo doesn't seem to have known much about the poetry market, for the heavenly lyrics wouldn't sell, and if it hadn't been for the generosity of a poor artist who occupied the adjoining attic, it's a fair chance that Apollo's wife and child would have starved. But Irene had one other asset, her beauty, which proved more marketable. She became an artist's model. But the artist, like the publishers, insulted her and her engagement at an end, she accepted an invitation to go yachting with a Croesus for six months. Finding her virtue invulnerable, this Haynes entered into an agreement by which he was to be content with her presence only and the satisfaction of having all his world believe the worst. Irene didn't care about her reputation and she had made an advantageous deal by which Apollo's child was well provided for, so off she went in high spirits while the poor artist who had stood by her in her poverty, hoping that some day he might win her love, retired to his garret to commit suicide after willing all his few possessions to her. Haynes, the agreeable Croesus, had not, of course, the remotest idea that Irene would make him live up to the letter of his agreement, so after providing her with silks and jewels and all else that he could think of, he drank himself into bravery and went to her cabin, but Apollo, who had looked on unconcernedly enough when it was only a case of food and shelter, fire and clothing, now asserted himself as he had promised to do in such a contingency and the adventurous millionaire was struck dead by lightning which set fire to the yacht. Irene, though burning to death, knows it is only her material body which is being destroyed and that she is now on the way to her promised immortality, having fulfilled her mission in bearing and providing a comfortable maintenance for the child. Holmes once said that the foolishest book is a leaky boat on a sea of wisdom—some will manage to get in in spite of you, but Dr. Holmes never encountered the ghostly shadow of anything so utterly idiotic as "The Eternal Fires," which comes from the house of Mitchell Kennerley.

Sam Turner, Early Bird

It is a very interesting and engaging young man whom George Randolph Chester has depicted in Sam Turner, "The Early Bird." Sam was born a hustler and circumstances developed the trait until, at twenty-seven he is able to meet some of the big financiers on their own ground, checkmate their clever moves and anticipate their intentions. As he explains to Theophilus Stevens in the first chapter, "You used to go after these things yourself. Now you send out people empowered only to look and not to purchase." Sam Turner has a partner, a "kid brother" who is the apple of his eye, and it is Jack who has enjoyed all the advantages of culture, leisure and adulation. "My kid brother"is quoted in every second sentence and for a wonder, the youngster is neither an inflated balloon nor a solid chunk of stone, but really all that Sam represents him to be. Sam has started out to enjoy a vacation of a fortnight spent at an obscure summer resort where there would be no intrusion of business, but Sam Turner could no more escape from business than he could leave the earth. The very first thing he did was to fall in love, very completely and thoroughly, too, and though his courteship furnishes comedy enough for the reader, it is desperately serious for himself. The real obstacle to his success lay in his addiction to business, his habit of pushing every deal through as quickly as possible, and the perversity with which business crises would precipitate themselves every time that things showed the remotest probability of going smoothly with him and Josephine. As to the vacation which the reader is all the while smiling at, when brother Jack remonstrated at the decision to run off somewhere else and close up a deal—"But you're on your vacation. That's no way to rest." "On my vacation!" snorted Sam. "Of course I am. I'm not losing a minute of my vacation. The proper way to have a vacation is to do the thing you enjoy most." Pleasure is the thing we like doing; work the thing we like to get done, and there's a vast difference between the "Early Bird" who is up and about because he enjoys early rising and the early worm who is forced abroad and takes no pleasure in it, so falls victim to the alert bird. Sam Turner puts the same qualities to work in legitimate business that Wallingford made use of in his get-rich-quick schemes, and in the two Mr. Chester has depicted careers almost diametrically opposite. "The Early Bird" comes from the Bobbs-Merrill Company.

SAN FRANCISCO TOWN TALK

The Sacramento Hotel

The cities of Northern California during the past year or so have been taking their place with the cities of Southern California in the matter of hotels. Excluding San Francisco and Oakland from consideration the northern cities have not compared well with the southern cities in the matter of hotel accommodations. Now however through the enterprise of their citizens they are coming into their own. Sacramento is one of these. The Hotel Sacramento has given it a conspicuous place on the hotel map of California.

The Hotel Sacramento need not fear comparison with any hotel in the State. There is no hotel of its size in the State better equipped. There is no hotel of any size in the State where the service is better or the effort to please more untiring. Truly the Hotel Sacramento is a hostelry of which Sacramento's citizens may well be proud.

Of colonial architecture, built of reinforced concrete the Hotel Sacramento is six stories high and contains two hundred and thirty rooms, two hundred of them with private baths. The dining room can accommodate six hundred people and the presiding genius of the kitchen can satisfy the most exacting epicure that ever ordered a dinner. The hotel operates its own refrigerating, vacuum cleaning, electric lighting and steam heating plants.

The lobby of the hotel to which there are entrances both on Tenth and K streets, is finished in Italian marble with an encircling mezzanine floor opening into beautifully furnished parlors and writing rooms.

Below the sidewalk is a rathskeller where supper may be served for dancing parties; also a very cosy buffet, barber shop, manicuring and chiropodist parlors.

But the feature of the hotel of which the management is particularly proud is the roof garden with its chairs and tables and flowering shrubs. From this roof garden a splendid view of Sacramento and the surrounding country may be had. Close at hand looms the grand dome of the capitol and in the distance may be seen the Sacramento River winding along like a silver thread. In the warm weather for which Sacramento is famous this roof garden is destined to great popularity. Already it is spoken of by travelers who have passed an hour or so amid its beauties.

The success of a hotel depends upon the experience of its manager. The Hotel Sacramento would not be popular, with all its conveniences, unless a popular man were at its head. There is such a man in the Hotel Sacramento. He is Mr. Albert Bettens, one of the best known hotel men in this State. It is only necessary to state that Bettens used to run the California Hotel in this city and that he is at present running not only the Hotel Sacramento but also the St. James Hotel in San Jose. With Mr. Bettens in charge it is no wonder that the Hotel Sacramento has from the first been so conspicuously successful

To Sacramento via the Netherlands Route

Calling the Attention of San Franciscans to a Charming Trip by Water from This City to the State Capital

By Robert McTavish

When will the Sacramento River come into its own? When will its manifold beauties commend it to Northern Californians who love to travel by water? Will it take another generation to impress upon us the too-little-known fact that we have within easy reach one of the most picturesque bodies of water in the West? Or will we wake suddenly to the realization of a new interest, to the fascination of a new recreation, to the spell of a practically undiscovered waterway?

These are thoughts which come to one in the course of the trip by steamer from San Francisco to Sacramento. It is not yet what might be called a popular trip. The steamer carries many passengers, it is true; but they make only a small part of the thousands who travel every month from this city to the capital. And most of them are unfamiliar with the trip by steamer. They seem to be making it for the first time. It is a new experience. No, the trip is not yet popular. It is still a novelty, an experience full of unknown possibilities; not a familiar excursion fraught with well-known, eagerly remembered attractions. Some day it will be different, of course, but today the trip up the bay and the Sacramento River is an excursion into strange waters and unfamiliar scenes.

"The Netherlands of America" somebody has felicitously christened the lower Sacramento River region. There is an alluring charm in the name. Not all of us have had the good fortune to explore the waterways of Holland, but we are all more or less acquainted with the somber beauty of Dutch landscape and waterscape. Surely if the Netherlands of America possess even a modicum of the interest which attaches to the Low Lands of Europe, they are worth exploring. The reasoning is perfectly sound, as all those have discovered who have devoted a day to the trip.

At eight o'clock in the morning when the Steamer "Navajo" leaves the Pacific street dock the bay is alive with passenger traffic. The ferry boats headed for San Francisco are black with commuters. But the bay, unlike the Sacramento River, is a well-conned lesson to San Franciscans, so the voyager to the Netherlands of America may well sit down to breakfast in the comfortable dining room of the "Navajo" with the consciousness that he will not miss anything that he has not seen before. It is when the steamer has passed Alcatraz and Angel Islands and approaches the Contra Costa coast and San Pablo Bay that the trip begins to be interesting. A balmy breeze blows along this coast and the landward view is beautiful. Sitting in an easy chair on the upper deck, sheltered from the hot rays of the sun by an awning that extends almost from rail to rail one may enjoy the peaceful picturesqueness of the hills shimmering in heat and kissed by a sky of Italian blue. At the foot of these hills and in strong contrast to their tranquility wharves stretch out into the water and there are great factories and warehouses near them, humming with industrial activity.

As the steamer approaches Carquinez Straits a scene of wonderful charm unfolds itself. On both sides rolling hills clothed in the richest verdure bound the horizon while below stretch to the water's edge fat fields and pastures. The red roofs of farm houses peep out from groves of poplars and willows. In the distance are Mare Island and Vallejo and before the steamer emerges from the narrows pretty Benicia with its church steeples is seen and the mind runs back to the historic days when here was the capitol of the State.

To the sportsman Suisun Bay is more interesting than the Bay of San Pablo, for here are the celebrated Suisun marshes, the favorite resort of game birds. But to the lover of nature it is the changing effects of sky and water, the purple of the hills and the dun of the lowlands that fill the mind with exaltation. The eye roves in lazy satisfaction over scenes that artists have never yet adequately interpreted. Land and water meet in perfect harmony and the sun gilds their surfaces, softening the tints of the earth, warming the gorgeous hues of the bay and clothing the trees, the shrubs and the flowers in more glorious raiment. It matters not how interesting your book or magazine, you will cut few pages while the "Navajo" is traversing this fascinating region.

The steamer is now in the midst of the delta lands of the Sacramento River. Islands abound, small and large, some covered with dense undergrowth, others stretching into hundreds of acres of carefully cultivated grain and orchard and vegetable lands. This is a region of immense productivity, for not only do the lands yield their fruits for a hundred markets but the waters are alive with fish and inshore the nets of the Greek and Italian fishermen are spread for their catch. We pass private wharves and up long shady vistas of waving trees catch glimpses of homes that evidence prosperity and happiness. They are but transient glimpses as the steamer races along, but they fill the mind with pleasant thoughts and images. Now too we pass little villages, at some of which we stop. They are full of bustle as the steamer approaches. There is freight to be loaded and unloaded, there are passengers waiting on the wharves to go aboard and friends waiting for passengers who leave the steamer, men in their shirt sleeves and broad straw hats, women and girls in light summery garments with parasols. The inevitable bare-footed boy is frolicking about and the toot of motor horns tells of farmers who are not worrying about mortgages or poor crops.

Of all these villages Rio Vista seems to me the most picturesque. Its housetops, gaily painted in green and red, emerge from the treetops. A trim little school house tops the neighboring hill, a sharp church spire points to heaven, like the finger of religion. Everything looks neat and clean and newly painted. The eye lingers long on this sweet hamlet, turning to catch a last glimpse as the steamer threads the curving channel between the islands.

Running in a narrow channel between wooded banks that have been re-enforced by the hand of man against the ravages of the flood waters, the steamer carries us now through a region of enchantment. That must be a dull unimaginative mind that does not respond to the poetry of the scene. Here one realizes how well the phrase "Netherlands of America" fits the lower river. The cool of afternoon broods on the waters which, save where churned to foam by the steamer's wheel, are as still as mountain pools. Tall trees with outstretched branches hung with moss cast fantastic shadows on them. Inviting nooks along the banks invite the wandering eye. How pleasant it would be to drift along this stream in a little boat, exploring the crannies, picking flowers and perhaps potting a rabbit in the tangled thicket. Here and there immense dredgers, scooping tons of silt from the bed of the river, call us back from our sentimental musings to a realization of the invaluable work which the various irrigation districts are doing to deepen the waterway. They are interesting things these big dredgers with their house boat comforts. As we pass them the workers and their wives pause to wave a friendly salutation.

As we approach Sacramento the aspect changes a good deal. There are more signs of man's activities. Factories send heavenward their columns of smoke, automobiles traverse the roads and wagons laden with the produce of the teeming river lands. There is more traffic on the river, pleasure craft and craft intent only on business.

Keeping the Levees Safe. One of the Ever-Working Dredges

Then the great dome of the capitol looms in the sky and we know that our trip is nearly completed.

A pleasant trip indeed it has been; a trip to be repeated many times; a trip to be recounted to one's friends; a trip which will never be forgotten, which will never lose its charm in retrospect even if future fortune permits us to explore the other Netherlands of Europe

Sacramento

By A. L. Crane
Secretary Sacramento Chamber of Commerce

Sacramento is growing by leaps and bounds. The population has practically doubled during the past six years. Business has grown proportionately. Property values have doubled, trebled and in some instances, quadrupled. The population when the last Federal census was taken was about thirty thousand. It is more than sixty thousand now and growing at the rate of ten thousand a year.

Sacramento is fairly alive with vim, vigor and enterprise. New railways, overland steam lines and interurban electric lines are building to and through the city. Many new enterprises, some of them involving millions of capital, have recently been established. Bank deposits and bank clearings for each month show a marked increase over the corresponding month of last year and of previous years. The city assessment roll increased thirty per cent in two years. The assessment of Sacramento County increased forty-seven per cent in the same period.

The rapid growth of Sacramento reflects a condition that is co-extensive with the Sacramento Valley. It is the result of an era of development due principally to the opening to settlement of Sacramento Valley lands. This settlement has only just begun; the millions of acres awaiting settlers is assurance of a much greater growth.

Sacramento is situated at the strategic point for the control of the commerce of this great valley empire, being at the head of tide water on the Sacramento River and at the natural point of convergence of railway lines crossing the State in any direction. It is and always will be the financial, commercial and railway center. It is also an important manufacturing center, having the main shops of the Southern Pacific and Western Pacific Railways. The combined advantages of water and rail transportation and of abundant power in nearby mountain streams which electrical transmission renders easily available, insure a large industrial development.

New buildings, public buildings, business blocks and homes, are visible evidences of this growth. Both the county of Sacramento and the city have undertaken large building enterprises during the past two years. The county is building a new courthouse and jail at a cost of $660,000; it is building 100 miles of macadamized roads with concrete bridges at a cost of $825,000. The city is building a city hall at a cost of $300,000, and has just completed a new high school building at a cost of $250,000.

grapes. At Fair Oaks and Orangevale large areas are devoted to oranges, olives, lemons, figs and other fruits. This county contains the principal strawberry district of the State, produces the bulk of the asparagus crop and furnishes beans to the markets of the world. Practically all the peaches, pears, plums, grapes and other deciduous fruits shipped from this State pass through Sacramento. Eighty-five per cent are grown within a radius of fifty miles.

pending is a sale, for colonization purposes, of the Haggin ranch of 42,000 acres, which adjoins the city north, and the recent purchase for the purpose of reclamation and colonization of 60,000 acres of swamp lands east of the river near the city.

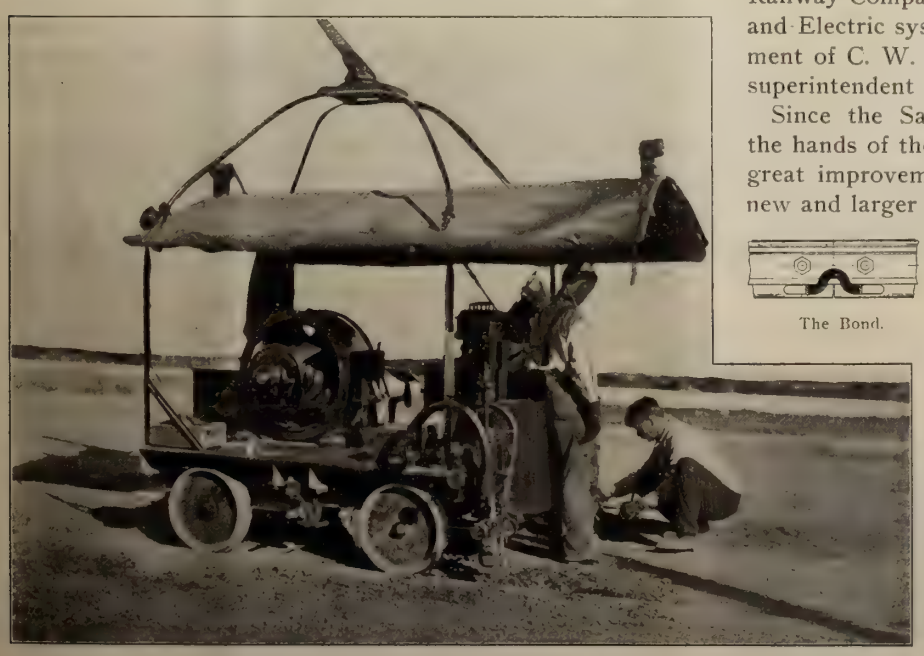
Pacific Gas and Electric Facts

One of the most troublesome things in connection with the proper maintenance of efficiency in an electric street-car system was to keep the joints of the rails so connected by a solid metal bond that there would be a continuous back circuit for the current, after passing through the trolley wire, the car motors, and the wheels, to return through the rails to the power house. The rails themselves must be slightly apart to allow for expansion during warm weather; otherwise a continuous, solidly-welded, steel rail might be used.

As these bonds were generally attached to the rails out of sight, just below the level of the roadbed, they used to receive scant attention, and the losses of electric power through a defective track-return circuit were sometimes considerable. Then a rail-bonding device, mounted on a trolley car and operated by electricity taken from the trolley wire, was introduced. The purpose of this bonding car was to create intense heat at the point needed and then weld into clean, burnished spots on the two adjoining rails a connecting piece of heavy copper. The weld is so perfectly made by this means that no cracks or fissures are left to grow wider through wear and erosion. The junction thus formed is so complete that no force can tear away that bond; it is fused to stay. It cannot be removed except after considerable mutilation and a lot of work with proper tools. The operation of brazing a bond to ordinary rails takes from forty-five to sixty seconds, using an alternating current of about 2,000 amperes at five volts, after converting and transforming about twenty amperes at 500 volts taken from the trolley wire.

All the necessary apparatus is mounted on a small trolley car. The accompanying illustration shows the bonding car used by the Sacramento street-car system, which is owned by the Pacific Gas and Electric Company. The man squatting down is holding the bond, but he is no "bloated bond-holder." That is Paul R. Shipley, the foreman.

The car is provided with a small portable electric grinder for burnishing perfectly smooth the spots to which the bond is to be fused. A brass-lined bonding clamp is adjusted. On the burnished side of the rail this clamp holds a carbon electrode pressing the copper bond against the spot where the weld is to be made, and on the opposite side of the rail the clamp holds close a copper electrode. Then, as the electric current passes from one electrode to the other, through the bond terminal and the rail, the carbon becomes incandescent and, combined with the great current density in the surface of the steel, generates the heat required to produce a perfect weld at the exact spot desired.



The Electric Rail-Bonding Car, and Foreman Shipley of the Company's Car Shops at Sacramento.

The Bond.

Near the northern outskirts of Sacramento the Pacific Gas and Electric Company owns an amusement ground known as Oak Park. It is operated in connection with the company's twenty-nine miles of city trolley-car system. The park consists of an area of tree-shaded lawns, a skating-rink building, a scenic railway, a theatre building, various nickel-getting sideshows; and the Sacramento baseball grounds and grandstand. The accompanying picture, from a snapshot taken when the buck was not defying the trespasser, shows the deer in the paddock near the skating-rink. The buck (on the right) was presented to the park about three years ago by George Wisseman, and its mate, eating with it, was presented by Charles Hart. The doe in the foreground is their young one, and was born at the park.

Deer in Oak Park.

In January of 1906 the Sacramento Electric Gas and Railway Company became a part of the Pacific Gas and Electric system, and is now under the management of C. W. McKillip, with Edward S. Jones as superintendent of the gas works.

Since the Sacramento works have passed into the hands of the Pacific Gas and Electric Company great improvements have been made in the plant, new and larger sets of oil-gas generators have been installed, new purifiers have been constructed, and a 500,000 cubic-foot storage holder has been built. The street-main system has also been extended to keep up with the growth of the city, and a high-pressure gas system has been installed at Oak Park. Recently it was decided to increase the oil-storage capacity at the gas works, and a 10,000-barrel steel oil-tank was placed upon a barge in San Francisco and towed up the Sacramento River to the yard at the gas works.

The California National Bank of Sacramento

Not only a land mark, and a conspicuous figure among the buildings of Sacramento, but also an enormous power for good is the California National Bank. Its handsome red sandstone building stands on the corner of Fourth and J streets, and is at the present time undergoing large and extensive alterations and additions.

The bank was originally incorporated under the title of "California State Bank," March 31, 1882, with a small paid up capital of fifty thousand dollars. It began business with three employees, and seven officers. The original quarters were in the building on the southwest corner of Fourth and J streets, now occupied by another bank, and it was in the summer of 1889 that operations were begun for the erection of the present handsome building. In January, 1907, the institution was nationalized, under the title of "The California National Bank, of Sacramento."

In contrast with its humble beginning, it is interesting to note that its present capitalization, surplus and undivided profits show one million, four hundred thousand dollars, with total assets of over ten millions. Its employees now number nearly fifty people, and some idea of the steady expansion of business may be gained from the fact that the alterations and additions now in progress, will give an increased floor space of three to one; six new teller cages, large additional private office, and a handsome Directors' Room. The present safe deposit vaults will be converted into an additional cash vault, and new safe deposit valuts, four times the capacity of the present ones are being built. These new safe deposit valuts are being built of twenty-four inch concrete, reinforced with a net work of steel rails. Next to this, on the inside of the valult lie four inches of Manganese steel, taken from the rock crushers of the gold dredging companies. These jaws are the hardest Manganese known, and are absolutely drill proof. Inside of this, on the inside of the vault lie four inches of Maninches of armour plate, similar to that used by the United States Government on its battleships. The door alone will weigh over fifteen thousand pounds, and will be one of the latest and most approved models, operated by the latest Yale time locks.

In all the years of its existence, the California National Bank has played an active and prominent part in every movement which has had for its object the uplift and betterment not only of Sacramento, but of the great valley, as well.

Its Directorate are men of wide experience and skill, and the influence of their work has permeated the whole of the institution.

The Central California Traction Company

The Sacramento Valley is growing rich in electric railroads, and the latest addition to the net work of steel rails, which are rapidly grid-ironing the valley in every direction, is the Central California Traction Company.

This road will be another connecting link between Sacramento and Stockton, and is practically built all the way between those two cities. Leaving Sacramento on Eighth and J streets, the line runs south to X street, skirts the edge of the city to Thirtieth street, runs through Oak Park, one of Sacramento's leading suburbs, out on to the Upper Stockton Road. This road is traversed for a short distance, until the line reaches the new subdivision owned by the company, called Colonial Heights, a subdivision which is destined to be the handsomest and most ideal residence section which Sacramento will enjoy. Leaving Colonial Heights, the road will run through a great vineyard and dairying country, touching several large vineyards, hitherto without direct transportation, passes close to the town of Florin, crosses the Cosumnes River, and thence on to Lodi, where it connects with the section of the road which runs direct to Stockton.

The enormous value of this new transportation to Sacramento cannot be over estimated. It will open up territory hitherto only accessible by country road; it will afford farmers, fruit growers, dairy men and poultry men new markets for their products, and facilities for doing their shopping in large centers.

The road itself is a splendid example of modern railway building, its construction and road bed being equal to any transcontinental line. The equipment will be of the best, thus enabling the company to maintain very fast schedules, and a most convenient service.

Mr. George W. Peltier is the guiding spirit of the road. He has taken a personal interest in all its operations from the preliminary work to its opening, and the vigor with which he has prosecuted every movement has contributed very largely to its success.

Colonial Heights, the new subdivision just opened by the company is being laid out with beautiful parks and boulevards; it will have cement side walks, curbings and gutters; the lots are wide and deep, and thanks to the Central California Traction Company, it will enjoy a suburban service similar to no other, with a line running to it, past it, and through it. Already many people are buying home sites there.

Corporation-Baiting

The attitude of the Administration toward railway corporations as indicated by recent developments at Washington is decidedly gratifying to everybody who believes that these corporations are making too much money and that checks should be put upon them. What the effect of this attitude may have on the country at large is another matter not to be quite apprehended at the present moment. We are not inclined to indulge in pessimistic prophecy. But at the same time we are not to be persuaded by corporation-baiters that the present situation is not fraught with menace. This situation is but an aggravation of that which was precipitated by Mr. Taft's predecessor when he began urging governmental supervision of corporations and characterizing as visionary the hope of adequate control by the several States. Along with uncertainty as to the final outcome of the agitation by a Republican President of the principles that were once regarded as distinctly Bryaniac came the halt in that "abounding prosperity" about which Mr. Roosevelt was exceedingly enthusiastic in his first annual message of 1901. Now that uncertainty seems about to be succeeded by something definite perhaps we should rejoice on the theory that it is better to hasten the inevitable evil day than to remain disquieted and disturbed. Apparently public sentiment is in favor of empowering the politicians to harass the railroads as much as they please. And doubtless it is better that the public should experience the effect of indulging the politicians than that it should be kept in ignorance of the folly of such indulgence.

Our Thrifty Italian Fellow-Citizens

Now that the searchlight of official inquiry has been thrown into our Italian colony it is easy to comprehend the amazing prosperity of our Latin Quarter. It will be remembered that our thrifty fellow-citizens from sunny Italy astonished us by their enterprise and celerity immediately after the great tragedy of 1906. Long before the insurance companies began pouring out their golden treasure the pactolian stream was flowing through the channels of commerce at North Beach, flushing them of debris, and insuring a rich harvest for the building trades. Not figuratively, but actually, were the ruins of the old town still smoldering, when the Italian banks—and there are more of them than of any other kind—opened for business, not a little of which consisted in emptying tin cans and stockings that had been handed over the counters by representatives of the fish, vegetable, flower and scavenger industries. Prosperity was burgeoning in the Latin Quarter months before it took root elsewhere, and the first signs of rehabilitation were those that were manifested in that populous section where the air is ever fragrant with the allium sativum and race suicide is unknown. The phenomena that excited much comment in the spring of 1906 we can now understand. The Italians of San Francisco have a genius for organizing business. Our greatest trust magnates can get pointers worth having from the astute gentlemen who, availing themselves for assets of the fish in the sea, constructed a perennial corner in crabs and transformed the humble sand-dab into an aristocratic pompano to become the staple of a giant monopoly. Wizards in finance are these scions of the ancient world-conquerors of the Mediterranean. They have built up in our midst not one but several monopolies, and all of them are Latin from top to bottom. Italians catch fish for an Italian trust, and the fish are marketed by Italians. Our vegetables and our flowers are raised by Italians for Italians and they are marketed by Italians. Assuredly from the commercial standpoint at least the Italian is not at all inferior to the Yankee.

Our Vanishing Factories

The Examiner has discovered that San Francisco has not all the industries that it should have. But the Examiner does not tell us the reason why. It affects the belief, however, that more industries would be flourishing in San Francisco if all of us could be induced to cultivate the habit of buying home products. "San Francisco should be a great cotton manufacturing city," says the Examiner; "and the boots and shoes for the whole Pacific Coast should be made here too"; also, "San Francisco should have great furniture factories." Nothing is needed, we are told, but energy. Let energy be developed and "capital will be forthcoming." All of which would be amusing to local capitalists who have been forced out of business by organized labor were it not for the sadness that tinges their emotions when they are reminded of the days agone when San Francisco was on a footing with other cities in the matter of the price of labor. Not many years ago San Francisco manufactured boots, shoes and furniture for the whole Pacific Coast. It also manufactured a great deal of clothing and a great deal of machinery. One by one the manufacturers either went out of business or established their factories in other cities. It is not hard to learn the reason why. Those that have remained to apply their energies in other fields are not reluctant to discuss the story of the transition. The melancholy fact is that San Francisco has suffered greatly at the hands of organized labor, and that as a consequence rival centres of industry have grown up on the Pacific Coast. Now it does no good to sequester the truth when discussing the slump in our commercial affairs. To this slump and to nothing else must be attributed the comparatively small increase in the population of San Francisco in the last ten years. The telling of the truth is not conclusive of an unreasonable hostility to the fundamental principles of unionism. The justness of those principles are universally acknowledged. Nor is the average employer in San Francisco prejudiced against labor in its efforts to secure decent treatment; but every employer of labor knows that the unions have availed themselves unreasonably and unjustly of the strength of the position which they have obtained in this city. And while conditions remain as they are we need not look for the application of energy to the revival of abandoned industries. On the contrary we are bound to see others languish into inanition. Even now the Union Iron Works, once the pride of the city, affords us an example of the dismal trend of affairs. The plant that once employed six thousand men, supporting families comprising nearly twenty thousand people, has now about a thousand wage-earners on the pay-roll. The firm that put the Oregon into service, that constructed some of the finest war vessels of our navy will now consider itself lucky if permitted to build one or two submarine boats.

A Glimmer of Sanity

Among the refreshing signs of the times is one that indicates a suspicion in the minds of magazine editors that the public is surfeited with muck. Occasionally nowadays one may find a magazine in which there is nothing of special interest to lovers of detraction and defamation, nothing calculated to strengthen popular distrust of conservative statesmen or to foster the delusion that to regenerate the nation we must emancipate ourselves from all the restraints of our representative form of government. So great a change has come over the spirit of some of our magazine editors that they are actually engaged in repairing reputations that but a short time ago they seemed bent on utterly destroying. For example the Metropolitan for May accords posthumous justice to the late E. H. Harriman, one of the many victims of that most popular of all calumniators, the Hon. Theodore Roosevelt. Truth, the child of time, has come to vindicate the great railroad magnate. We learn from testimony that cannot be gainsaid that he was not only innocent of the things of which he was accused, but that in more than one instance good and even generous actions for which he deserved the highest praise were stamped with the imputation of bad motives. Not less rich in lessons for the susceptible and misguided public is an article in McClure's for June from the pen of Asher C. Hinds, parliamentary clerk of the House of Representatives, which treats of the subject matter of the recent sensational squabble between Speaker Cannon and the insurgents. From Mr. Hinds we learn of the insincerity of the men who have been making political capital out of their opposition to the Speaker's methods. Men of intelligence may not be in need of enlightenment on this subject. None, perhaps, but the average citizen, has been deluded by the howling demagogues of the House. But even those that are more or less familiar with the situation, and that are not to be deceived by the simulation of outraged feelings, will find much to interest them in what Mr. Hinds has written. For he not only explains why the rules are as they are and why the enforcement of them is essential to orderly procedure, but he enlivens his exposition with historical narrative from which we learn that insurgency in a mild form has been practiced since the second decade of the last century. As long ago as 1812, when Henry Clay presided over the House of Representatives, John Randolph of Roanoke declared that "the last relic of freedom of debate" had disappeared from the House. The history of the House is interspersed with similar discoveries with respect to this last intangible relic. Fifty years ago Thomas S. Babcock of Virginia, who became the Speaker of the First Congress of the Southern Confederacy, hit the nail on the head when he said "Whatever goes wrong in the House of Representatives, whatever a man has to explain before his constituents, he is very apt to attribute to the rules of the House of Representatives." And it was about the same time that Clement Vallandigham of Ohio declared on the floor of the House: "Your Speaker, whatever his natural disposition may be, is, by the necessities of his office, a despot." Thus we see that friction between the Speaker and a militant minority is far from being either a phenomenon of the current dispensation or the result of the peculiar and malign obstinacy of Joe Cannon. It is true that for the first time it has produced a conflagration, but the spectacular consummation is altogether theatrical as we may learn from McClure's. And now let us hope that other magazines will soon realize that muckraking is not the only kind of journalism worth while; that the other side of the story may be worth telling; that perhaps for the public there is as much entertainment in the truth about insurgents as in the fiction that has popularized demagoguery and paralyzed the imagination of the masses.

Roosevelt's Fatal Gift of Gab

We have been waiting a long time for Colonel Roosevelt's unbridled tongue to "shake out its master's undoing," and at length it appears that the inevitable has happened. Giving rein to the habit of speaking his mind for the edification of mankind, it will probably be found that the fox has brayed like an ass once too often. Infantile is the apprehension to which the Colonel's latest enormity is inaccessible. Among his ardent admirers at home there may be many who regard his boorish impertinence as nothing more than a characteristic specimen of the sublime frankness of their candid hero. But there are certainly few so obtuse as not to perceive that the sentiments which he expressed touching the politics of Egypt are bound to produce a relaxation of his hold on the public imagination. The indications are that the American Napoleon has blundered egregiously. If he is en route to St. Helena before getting back from Elba some of us will be profoundly grateful. Yet at the same time none of us should be insensible of the humiliation that he has brought upon the nation. By his conduct not only in England but wherever he has peacocked since his emergence from the African jungle he has been an object lesson in the science of government, inspiring most unpleasant criticism of republican institutions. What are men of intelligence to infer with respect to a people that has made a prodigious idol of this featherbrain quack; of a people to whom he is a fetich, a world-straddling Colossus, the incarnation of all virtue and wisdom, the ultimate salvation of a nation? Philosophers have said that to recognize the principle of equality is to insure the triumph of mediocrity. Does not their judgment appear to have been vindicated by the purblind homage that we have paid to our Bombastes Furioso of Kettle Hill? Democracy, we are told, rests on the legal fiction that the majority has not only force but reason on its side, the consequence being that it hands over the decision of all that is greatest to all that is the most incapable. Does not this observation receive color both from the applause that we have given to charlatanism and the protracted morbidity of Rooseveltism? The impression that it does, we may be sure, is prevalent in Europe now that Europe has become intimately acquainted with the First Citizen of the Republic.

The Man and His Epoch

was a time when Europe thought that Roosevelt was a statesman of profound genius. The European estimate of him was based on what seemed to be the judgment of the pharisaical, mob-coddling American press. Furthermore the judgment of many Europeans was unconsciously influenced in his favor by his aspersions on the institutions of his country and his intemperate animadversions on the methods of our politicians, our financiers and our great industrial concerns. His lamentations over the failure of the Constitution, his strictures on the courts, his philippics against undesirable citizens—all these extravagances of a pampered Ego appealed to European prejudice against the United States, and won for the archetype of all our uplifters the unbounded admiration of our severest critics. Pleased were they to regard him as a great patriot who was resolved to redeem his vulgar country and purge it of corruption. Now they have a quite different opinion of him. At close range they have discovered that he is mainly an egotist, lacking in mental poise and devoid of discretion. His culture they know to be sham, his ideals of the worst primitive nature. They are amazed that a man whose mental equipment is so light should have been able to create an epoch in one of the most powerful of civilized countries. Yet the prodigy of his performance is much greater than they are able to conceive. Mr. Roosevelt's achievements are to be considered miraculous for the same reason that we consider miraculous the performances of the mediocrities whom Christ chose for his Apostles. Despite his limitations such was the potency of his personality that he did even more than create an epoch. He revolutionized our standards and principles of morality; he made our reverence for the handiwork of our forefathers fall into decay; he threw so powerful a spell over the masses that they believed him incapable of doing wrong and worshiped him most when he did wrong. And the masses have yet to recover from his malign influence. They still regard the betrayal of a confidence as one of the most beautiful of the virtues. A Kerby they believe to be qualified for sainthood. The principle that the end justifies the means they approve with all the enthusiasm with which it was first employed by their idol and mentor. The masses have yet to return to peace, sobriety and steady habits. The obliteration of hysteria, quack reform and fictitious strenuosity has yet to be accomplished. Mr. Roosevelt's notion of reform continues to obtain throughout the country. Our sense of justice is as defective today as it was the day that we read the "Dear Maria" letters, as it was the day we learned of the Machiavellian treatment that Harriman received. We are still in need of that refinement of manners which facilitates apprehension of the absurd and the banal. We need a Fielding or a Hogarth, a Swift or a Voltaire to sharpen our perceptive faculties, to enable us to differentiate a confidence game from a square deal. Perhaps Mr. Roosevelt may not be able to work us again, but assuredly it would be absurd to consider ourselves immune.

Unworthiness

Love turned upon the secret ways and fled,
  Pursued by phantoms to his guarded keep,
  Where lay he safe and desolate to weep.
Forlorn as Hope, his heart renewed and bled
And the lone anguish smote him with a dread
  And barren sorrow. Still he heard the deep
  And threatening cry that drove him from the steep
Remoter height where he had dared to tread.
His eyes uplifted to the mountain sought
  That evermore lost form and face that shone
  Like the fair promise of an unknown land.
He knew himself for evermore alone,
  For where he had not stood and had not fought
  There stood the angel with the flaming brand.

Perspective Impressions

Hiram Johnson says that if the polls were opened this week he would be elected. Hiram thinks that he is as close to God as he was to Langdon.

Counterfeiters ought to be eager to break into the penitentiary at Jefferson City, Missouri, where a plant for the manufacture of bogus money has been in operation twenty years.

Labor Commissioner McKenzie is being abused for telling the truth about the need of Oriental labor in California. Which reminds us of the saying of Bishop Horne, "If anyone will tell me how truth may be spoken without offending some, I will spare no labor to learn the art of it."

"I am impelled to speak mainly because of my deep concern in the welfare of mankind and future civilization. My first thought is bound to be for the welfare of the masses of mankind." Theodore Roosevelt speaking as an emissary of Heaven at Guild Hall, London, May 31, 1910.

When Poultney Bigelow made a flying trip to the Panama Canal and passed judgment on the work that was being done there Theodore Roosevelt expressed his astonishment, saying that the character of Bigelow's judgment was to be inferred from the brevity of his visit. As the Colonel spent less than a week in Egypt may we not apply the same principle for the purpose of deduction?

The success of the Spreckels-Phelan publicity bureau in spreading the reputation of San Francisco for corruption is evidenced by George Bernard Shaw's allusion to this city in his discussion of Colonel Roosevelt's Guild Hall speech. Of graft in Pittsburg, Chicago, New York and Philadelphia Shaw has not been informed, so he holds up this city as the one and only horrible example.

The Illinois legislature that was bribed to elect Lorimer to the United States Senate was chosen at a direct primary. Nevertheless our faith in the belief that the voice of the people is the voice of God must not be shaken.

Ned McGowan's Narrative

(This serial account of the adventures of a fugitive from the vengeance of the Vigilance Committee begins with the history of the circumstances that led to the organization of that so-called law and order body. McGowan has told us of his escape from San Francisco, of his flight to Santa Barbara and of the many romantic episodes that marked his career during the months he was in hiding. All the while the Vigilance Committee kept up a search for him, and he was assured of being hanged if captured. In the seventh instalment the reader accompanies him to the home of Dr. Nicholas A. Den where he was given protection, and where he remained until, as we learn in the eighth instalment, his friends arranged for a journey to Sacramento where the legislature was in session—Editor's Note)

(Tenth Instalment)

We remained in Stockton the whole of that day, and then turned our horses' heads in the direction of Sacramento. For the first six miles the road lay through a lake of water, formed by the recent heavy rains, and in many places it came up to the horses' flanks.

After riding but a short distance further we came to Wood's Ferry, where we stopped to feed our horses and dine. At this place we met Mr. John Hodges, a partner of Judge Terry in the proprietorship of "Terry and Hodges' Mills," which, as many will remember, were burned down while Judge Terry was imprisoned by the Vigilance Committee. After dinner he pressed us to accompany him to his home and pass the night. As we did not care to reach Sacramento till Saturday night, we accepted his kind invitation, and accordingly set out for the mill, which is some ten miles off the road, and situated on the Mokelumne river. On arriving at the crossing place near the mill we found that the water had risen so much that it was idle to attempt to ford the river, and so remained on the side where we were, and found lodgings with some young friends of Mr. Hodges, who treated us very kindly, refusing any compensation for their hospitality.

In the morning we mounted our horses and bidding farewell to our hosts, commenced the last day's ride of our weary pilgrimage. We rode on without stopping or meeting with anything of interest until we came to the ranch of Mr. Thomas Harrigan, the proprietor of the Centerville Race Course, a few miles from Sacramento. Here we concluded that it was advisable to halt, and get some information as to how matters stood before venturing into the city. We found everything all right, however; for my friend Harrigan, who was delighted to see me, informed us that friends were prepared for our arrival, having been expecting it for several days. Accordingly, after partaking of a hearty supper, we again mounted and, shortly after night, rode into the capital. We put up our horses at a livery stable, and repaired at once to the Magnolia Hotel. I immediately sent for Mr. Charles T. Botts, a lawyer of eminence in Sacramento, and engaged his professional services. A writ of habeas corpus was prepared, to be sued out in case the sheriff of San Francisco, hearing of my arrival, should be compelled, in the discharge of his duty, to come to Sacramento to arrest me, and preparations were made to draft such a bill to be introduced into the Legislature as would meet the circumstances of my case.

These steps being taken, about eleven o'clock, I went with some friends to the bar of the Magnolia to drink, and, though I saw dozens of faces around me, I was not recognized by one. Every one took me for a ragged old miner just come in from "the diggings." It was soon known, however, that I had arrived, and I was visited by swarms of friends. I did not get to bed that night until three o'clock. I arose early in the morning, and placing myself in charge of my good friend William Williamson, Esq., I proceeded at once to a clothing store, and dressed myself in a full suit of decent apparel, and in the course of the morning a friend sent me a present of a very stylish White Hat, which I immediately donned and felt that "Richard was himself again."

It was thought advisable that on that day (Sunday) I should see as many of my friends as possible, and make the acquaintance of those new members whom I did not know, in order that I might tell them my story, and my reasons for asking the passage of the law which was being prepared. Accordingly I remained in my room holding a sort of levee and my friends must have brought nearly a thousand persons to see me. I stated my case to those on whose power I was compelled to rely, and had every reason to believe that my application would not be made to the Legislature in vain. That night I thought it prudent to leave the hotel, lest the officers of San Francisco should arrive late, and a hearing of the writ (it being Sunday) could not be obtained. Accordingly I went with a friend to a retired part of the city, letting but few know the place of my retreat. On awaking the next morning I inquired for the San Francisco papers, being desirous of seeing how my return to the upper regions suited my Vigilante friends, and one of the first things that met my eye was the following from the San Francisco Bulletin of Sunday, March 1st:

> Ned McGowan, the ubiquitous, has actually arrived in Sacramento. This time there is no humbug about it. He puts up at the "Magnolia" Hotel, where during all of yesterday he was the centre of a large circle of admirers with the like of whom this city swarms at present. Sacramento at this time resembles one of the old Jewish "Cities of Refuge," where murderers and other criminals could flee for shelter from the avengers of blood. How long this state of things shall continue depends entirely upon the inhabitants themselves, and of course is no business of the San Franciscans.

The next day, my counsel, Mr. Botts, set about the drafting of a proper bill for myself, to be introduced into the Legislature. It was thought, however, on reflection, that a copy of my indictment had better first be procured in order that the bill might be made to hold water at all points, and exactly meet my case without the possibility of its object being defeated by any "after-claps" in the way of technical quibbles. Accordingly a telegraphic despatch was sent to a friend in San Francisco requesting him to go to the office of the county clerk and procure a copy and send it up at once. Lo! and behold, however, it was ascertained, on application, that, notwithstanding the indictment had been found ten months previously, there had been filed no such document in the clerk's office of the court in which I was to be tried! After much diligent inquiry, it was found that the exceedingly scrupulous and careful district attorney of that county, Mr. H. H. Byrne, had actually deposited it in bank, lest, I suppose, some of my friends in their anxiety for my safety, might steal it from the county clerk, and thus expose his precious carcass to the wrath of his great "bug-bear," the Vigilance Committee, of which institution, doubtless for sufficient reasons of his own, he stood in mortal dread. He probably would have spared himself this precaution had he known that, attributing my indictment more to his base and selfish cowardice and ingratitude than to a conviction on the part of the grand jury that I was guilty, I always intended, conscious of my own innocence, to return and be tried whenever I could safely do so.

After some trouble the copy was procured and sent up to Sacramento, and the bill being prepared on the third day of March, it was placed in the hands of G. Jefferson Hunt of San Bernardino County, one of the most influential members of the Assembly, to be by him introduced into that body. The bill provided for a change of

Desolate

Under the moon, on a night of June,
I played in the desert on my bassoon:
It was most wonderful and grim
To play to the listening Seraphim;
It was most marvelous to play
In the lonely desert, under the moon,
While a lion sang to the deep bassoon:
And louder I played, with a touch of iron;
For I was desolate and grim,
And my heart was one with the heart of the lion,
Tuned by the holy Seraphim.

The Forest Theatre at Carmel

Being an Explanation of the Aims of the Carmelites in Their Projected Open Air Play House Written by One of the Projectors

By Michael Williams

A copy of the Call for May 9 has reached me here, where I am temporarily staying, and I find it contains an article attributing to me the honor of having suggested the idea of The Forest Theater of Carmel-by-the-Sea. It is true that the present movement toward realising the idea of an open air theater at Carmel (which movement appears to possess vitality, and to promise success) was initiated by me, but the actual steps in the matter were taken by Mr. Herbert Heron, who is the stage manager of the Forest Theater Society, and himself a practical actor, and a dramatist besides. To his energy and enthusiasm allied to his expert knowledge, are due the fine beginning of the dramatic work at Carmel. But everybody is helping. It is largely a group movement. The idea has been in the air at Carmel a long time. Mary Austin cherished it, and promoted it when here. And it is a part of a general plan for artistic work of a more than personal kind which is being wrought out at Carmel.

I trust you will allow me to take this opportunity to say something regarding the aims and objects of The Forest Theater Society, as the subject is of some public interest and much public importance.

In the first place, The Forest Theater Society is not in any way a commercial enterprise. While it will be our aim, and, we trust, our achievement, to make the venture pay for itself, and something over (as much over, indeed, as possible), nevertheless, The Forest Theater Society is not in any way a commercial enterprise. If we make any money above actual expenses—and, as you see above, I hope we will—this excess will be applied to enlarge and extend our dramatic work—or other artistic enterprises. For instance, an artistic magazine. All such plans as there, however, lie in the future. All I want to do by mentioning them at present is to make it clear that this is purely an artistic movement.

All over the civilized world today there is a renaissant movement in dramatic art. Particularly is this true of the English speaking countries. Perhaps because they so sadly needed a revival of dramatic art do these countries now seem so prominent in the dramatic world.

In many of the great cities—London, Dublin, Manchester, Glasgow, New York, Chicago, and elsewhere—artistic repertory, or "independent," or subsidized, theaters are springing up and meeting with deserved success. After having been looked upon for many generations as a mere after-dinner entertainment, or time-killer (save when Shakespeare was presented) the drama is now being recognized by an ever-growing body of people as an Art, comparable to poetry, and music, and prose literature. It is seen to be an instrument of creative life, even as the sister arts are when employed at their best uses. Not only in special theaters, but on the general commercial stage is the new spirit being welcomed. Animated by the hope of contributing worthwhile efforts to the cause of the dramatic renaissance, The Forest Theater Society was organized. We have an exceptional opportunity. We feel we can do something at Carmel that would be very difficult or perhaps impossible to accomplish elsewhere. As all know who have ever had the happiness of visiting it, Carmel is wonderfully beautiful. All the influences there make for beauty. Poets, novelists, and other writers, some of them of national importance, live there, as well as artists of other kinds, and many intellectual people, some of them connected with our universities.

Those who do not make Carmel their all-the-year home come in the summer and at Christmas, and other times. And continually there come and go artists, travelers, cultured people of all grades. Thus, a theater at Carmel, devoted to the highest kind of drama—and to that alone—has a most exceptional opportunity for achieving the best kind of success. It is Beauty in the drama that will be striven for at Carmel. The beauty that is truth—the truth of poetry, the truth of honest prose realistic drama, the truth of the dance, the truth of masques; in short, realizing that Beauty has many aspects, The Forest Society will try its best not only to understand and interpret the truth and beauty of Shakespeare, but also the truth and beauty of Ibsen—the mystic truth of Maeterlinck—and the logical truth of Shaw. But much more than this, the Forest Society will aim first of all at understanding and interpreting the works of American dramatists, preferably the new and untried ones. Realizing that drama, like all the arts, must continually experiment, and try new forms, and adapt itself to evolution, the Forest Society sees clearly even before it begins its work that it is going to make many mistakes in staging new works—but it also clearly sees that to stage but one authentic work of dramatic art that might have been lost but for it, would be to achieve a magnificent success.

There are many people (and not all of them Californians, either!) who find reason to believe that the Golden State is the predestined chief province of American art, in many branches. In literature, California's contribution to the nation's creative art is already splendid and famous. In painting, too, she has done wonders. Why not in drama as well? If the Forest Theater Society remains true to the ideals that inspire it now, California may be given reasons to feel proud of it.

Berkeley Professors Want Carnegie's Money

From the despatches we learn that Dr. Henry S. Pritchett, president of the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching, has discovered that an enormous number of ill-trained doctors have been graduated from cheap medical schools. Dr. Pritchett has discovered many things that are not mentioned in the despatches. He has discovered for example that the professors of our State University are not entitled to share in the pension fund of the Carnegie Foundation because the Hastings College of Law does not come up to the required standard. This is the college of which the good Dr. E. Robeson Taylor is dean, and the students of which are so ill-trained that they are unconscious of the impropriety of contributing to public clamor in courts of justice where men are on trial for their liberty. Dr. Pritchett's attitude toward the Hastings College of Law has been the cause of much heartburning in the faculty of our State University, the members of which believe they could perform their duties with much greater enthusiasm if they had before them the pleasing prospect of pocketing a little of Carnegie's tainted money in the less halcyon years to come. The philosophy which affects to teach us a contempt for money does not run very deep in Berkeley. Even in the academic groves, where intellect has its apotheosis Mammon that has enriched his thousands and damned his ten thousands is seated securely on his throne. Hence the frequent discussion that has been had there of the melancholy situation arising out of the deficiencies of the Hastings Law College. As a result of these discussions Dr. Pritchett has been an honored guest at Berkeley. He has been wined and dined there, and otherwise cajoled and coddled to the end that he might conclude that the Hastings College to the contrary notwithstanding the general average of the university was such as to subdue his scruples.

The Regents Implored

But the professors of Berkeley have learned that in order to qualify for a pension out of a private fund they must induce the regents to make the Hastings College conform with the Pritchett standards. And this they are eager to do despite the principle involved. This principle has been enunciated by certain ultra-dignified and dry-as-dust critics of the Carnegie Foundation. They have said that it might be all right for private schools to adopt regulations for the benefit of their professors, but that it might be highly improper for a State University to do so. According to their view of the matter a university supported by the people of a State ought to be conducted with a view to the best interests of the people of that particular State rather than in deference to the whims and crotchets of some multi-millionaire. Now, it is argued that the Hastings College of Law is an institution designed to make it possible for any young man to enter upon the study of law and that if it were standardized to enable the Berkeley professors to draw a pension the whole spirit of it would be altered. It is further argued that in view of the selfish motive of the Berkeley faculty the regents should not be guided by the proposals emanating therefrom. Furthermore it is suggested that a sense of delicacy should restrain the Berkeley professors from taking action in a matter which they cannot be expected to resolve impartially. But the professors have taken action. The professors of Berkeley are great moralists. And they are ever as ready to determine issues between themselves and the people of the State as they are to pass judgment on issues between other individuals and the people of the State. Therefore they have not hesitated to implore the regents to pay deference to the Carnegie Foundation.

A Cautious Pittsburgher

A few days ago a stranger entered the Fairmont and wrote in the register "R. J. Rust." He asked for good rooms and was shown to a suite overlooking the bay.

EUGENE J. DE SABLA JR.

Returning to the office he expressed his satisfaction with the accommodations and taking a pen wrote after his name, "Pittsburg, Pa." The clerk regarded him with questioning curiosity. "It is very simple," said Mr. Rust with a smile in answer to the clerk's look. "I do a great deal of traveling and I happen to be a resident of Pittsburg. All over the country there is a conviction that a traveler from Pittsburg has rolls of yellow bills to throw at the birdies. I am not poor but I am not one of Carnegie's multi-millionaires, so I take the precaution at all the hotels where I stop to secure my accommodations before I make known where I come from. I do not insinuate that the precaution would be necessary here, but I have found it well worth my while in some hotels and I take no chances. I am willing to pay my way but not to pay double because of an accident of birth. Do you blame me?" And the clerk admitted that he did not.

Kirkpatrick's Blunder

Colonel Kirkpatrick of the Palace finds that he made a blunder in the arrangement of the chairs and settees in the beautiful lobby of the new hotel. At the northern end the furniture is upholstered in stamped leather while at the southern end of the corridor it is done in damask and tapestry. Now the sun shines brightly at the southern end of the lobby and the politicians who love to bask in the sun almost as much as in the favor of a boss have preempted that part of the lobby for their own. While other guests are content with the leather accommodations the pollies sprawl on the red damask and the blue tapestry chairs and settees and these are beginning to show signs of wear. What wonder? when country office seekers scratch matches on the priceless pieces or attack them with jackknives or dent them with the barrels of their heavy revolvers or knick them with their carelessly disposed hobnailed shoes. As it is impossible to move the politicians out of the sun Colonel Kirkpatrick is thinking of putting the durable leather chairs and settees below the "political line" and shifting the more valuable furniture to the other end of the lobby. Of course he might put up a sign: "No politicians wanted" but what would the Palace be without the politicians?

The Good Judge Wilbur

There are certain salutary reflections which just at present commend themselves very seriously to Judge Curtis D. Wilbur of Los Angeles for whom the cloistered and fugitive virtue has no attractions. Imbued with the spirit of the times, and apparently unaware that a superfetation of virtue in job-chasers has provoked impatience in Heaven as is evident from the fate that is overtaking the righteous overmuch, Judge Wilbur has sallied forth to win the suffrages of the people by prejudicing voters against his fellow-citizens. Up and down the State he is going, making broad his phylacteries and thanking God he is not as other men. This is unprofitable business as every student of the Bible knows, and Judge Wilbur is immersed in the Scriptures in all his leisure moments. So fond is he of the Bible that he thinks it an outrage that it is not used in all our public schools, which is one of the reasons why his long-haired friends in Los Angeles think that he should be elevated to the Supreme Court. Now singularly enough Judge Wilbur is behaving in a manner against which the Bible abounds in warnings. "Come not near to me, for I am holier than thou" is a sentiment the Bible tells us to which utterance is given only by men who are a smoke in the nose of the Almighty. Yet Judge Wilbur has made this sentiment the shibboleth of his campaign. He asks the people to vote for him because as the courts are corrupt they should vote for "men of truth, God-fearing men and haters of unjust gain." Thus does Judge Wilbur modestly stamp himself with the Hall-Mark. Thus does he proclaim his own goodness; thus, in defiance of the Bible's warnings, does he justify himself before men. Listen to Judge Wilbur, or read what he has to say in the Boughten Bulletin, the organ of those that devour widows' houses, and you may be inclined to suspect that he is properly to be classified with the men, who, being pure in their own eyes "are in need of washing from their own filthiness"; men who hate their brethren and ask that the Lord be glorified; the self-cannonized "who pray in the corners of the streets that they may be seen of men."

A Man San Francisco Needs

This city is sadly in need of a man to handle big amusement enterprises, a man of courage, of original ideas, of high business capacity and of magnetic personality. Los Angeles has such a man in Dick Ferris and Santa Cruz is proud of Fred Swanton, but what man has San Francisco to do what these men have done? It would be a great thing for San Francisco if Fred Swanton could be induced to devote his energies to the exploitation of amusement attractions here. I am moved to this statement not merely by the consideration of what Swanton has done for Santa Cruz but also by his achievement with Rowardennan. Everybody in northern California knows how Swanton has made Santa Cruz one of the most attractive and popular beaches in the State. Not many realize yet what he has done with Rowardennan. Rowardennan is a beautiful resort but hitherto it has been comparatively unknown. Since Swanton took hold of it, however, it has attained international renown. It all came of Swanton's resourcefulness, of his knack for being at hand to greet opportunity. There are a hundred places in the State where Jeffries might have trained as comfortably as at Rowardennan, but the proprietors of those places were not as enterprising as Fred Swanton. As a result of his energetic methods

CALIFORNIA NATIONAL BANK OF SACRAMENTO

Rowardennan has become a familiar name in all parts of the world. Interest in Jeffries is worldwide and everybody who reads the sporting page of a newspaper knows that the big fighter is training in a resort of the Santa Cruz mountains familiarly called "Rowdy Dow." The name is used as freely in "The Pink 'Un" of London as in the "World" of New York. The traveler who comes to California will remember the place and visit it. The advertising benefits which Swanton has derived from the presence of Jeffries are incalculable.

The Terms Berger Made

Of course Fred Swanton had to offer big inducements to Jeffries in order to get him to Rowardennan. Sam Berger, the manager of the heavyweight fighter, drove a hard bargain. I am told that Swanton made an agreement with Berger to keep ten members of the training entourage free of charge, to give the champion twenty-five per cent of the bar receipts during his training and the gambling privilege as well. The gambling privilege is worth a great deal of money. A party of Olympic clubmen paid a visit to the training camp a short time ago and went up against the gambling games with the result that they departed about three thousand dollars poorer, except in experience, than when they arrived. It is apparent that Berger made a good business deal. But so did Fred Swanton; his house is crowded all the time and it will figure prominently on the hotel map for many years to come.

Samuel—They're with the Jamaica ginger that was in the medicine chest.

Jesuitism and Rooseveltism

A minister of the gospel in Los Gatos has been accused of trying to win an election by stealing a ballot-box. The gentleman doubtless acted upon the theory that has come to be generally accepted throughout this enlightened nation, the theory that to serve a good cause a man is justified in calling the devil to his aid. This is the theory on which nearly all uplifters have acted who have been uplifting in accordance with the example of a certain revered President of the United States who once upon a time incorporated in a message to Congress a purloined letter which had been given to him by the Hon. Francis J. Heney. It was on this newly consecrated theory that young Kerby recently betrayed the confidence of his employers. It was by putting this theory in practice that the golden-rule Chief of Police of Toledo, who is now defending himself against a charge of gross immorality, won the favor and applause of all the muckrakers of magazinedom. There was a time, before we adjusted our moral view-point in accordance with the philosophy of the great Tribune, that we regarded with abhorrence the principle that the end justifies the means. The popular idea of Jesuitism is that it embodies this principle; and by reason of this idea bitter reproaches have been hurled at a great religious order. But in justice to the Jesuits be it said, they have always disclaimed the maxim and held that no justification for the imputation can be found in their teaching or in their literature. Even their enemies, however, do not seem to think it at all singular that the maxim which the followers of Loyola indignantly repudiate has become one of the fundamentals of American morality.

Gambling in San Francisco

A few weeks ago I told of meeting an Easterner who likes to gamble a little now and then and of hearing from his lips an expert estimate of the Northern, the gambling place just below the northern boundary line of San Mateo County. I met this fellow again recently and asked him whether he had been down there of late. His answer surprised me. He told me that he no longer found it necessary to make a long automobile trip to the county line for the purpose of hazarding a few gold pieces because he could risk his money with a great deal of comfort in the heart of San Francisco. I repeat that I was surprised. Do not mistake me for a greenhorn, please. Do not think that my eyes have been closed to the opportunities for gambling which have been offered in this city for many moons. I am not of those who imagine that the lid has ever been securely fastened on gambling. I happen to know just the contrary. But at the same time I was not prepared to learn that my eastern acquaintance would frequent the sort of gambling houses which I have in mind. They are squalid places in squalid neighborhoods and the company is promiscuous. I did not think the easterner had a taste for that sort of gambling. Further questioning convinced me that my estimate of him was correct. He does not like to gamble in low places and he does not have to. There are gilded gambling places in San Francisco, places adorned with all the tinsel so dear to the gambler's heart, places of bright electric lights and fine carpets, exquisite furniture and respectful servants, places where hospitality is dispensed to the gamester with a lavish hand. It is to places of this sort that my eastern acquaintance made reference when he told me that he no longer needed to leave the city when he felt the necessity of taking a chance.

A Place Off Market Street

There is no need of describing all these places. They are much alike, differing only in the degree of luxury with which they are fitted up. All are run on practically the same principles, although some make the pretense of being gentlemen's clubs while others more bold do not. One of these gambling places to which my eastern friend occasionally resorts is in the first block of Turk street, not very far from Market street. He gave me a good description of it. It must be an elaborately fitted place. And it must be making a pile of money for its proprietors. Who the proprietors are I am not going to say because I am not certain that my information is correct. The three names which I have heard mentioned in connection with this place have been very much in the public mouth recently. If these three men are in reality the proprietors, they must be making a barrel of money for the place is well patronized and the play runs high. Craps is the most popular game there and in craps, I am given to understand, the percentage is enormously in favor of the dealer. The expense of running one game of craps—and in this place there are more than one—is quite heavy. The men who preside at the crap table are paid $15 a day and there are six of them on duty during the twenty-four hours. So one table alone costs $90 a day in wages. But $90 is only a drop in the bucket at a crap table. My eastern acquaintance estimated for me that this particular gambling place represented an investment of $7,500. Supposing there are three men interested that would mean that each had put up $2,500. He thinks that each clears $500 a month without difficulty. Not a bad investment, is it?

When the Place Was Raided

My eastern acquaintance told me with considerable amusement of an incident which happened in this place last Saturday afternoon. It was a sort of a raid. If it had been the ordinary sort of raid my eastern acquaintance would not have regarded it with amusement, for he has a healthy respect for law and does not care to go to jail. But it was a most unusual sort of raid. The play was proceeding merrily when suddenly a buzzer buzzed. This was the signal of warning. It meant that there was danger at hand. The gamblers were equal to the emergency. The locks of the money trays snapped automatically, the dice disappeared in the twinkling of an eye, the crap outfit, detachable, was whisked away to a place of hiding. Presto! every evidence of gambling was gone and there were only a number of men clustered about a billiard table. At this moment a policeman rushed into the room with every evidence of excitement. His eye blazed, his face was red, he puffed from climbing the stairs. "For God's sake," he implored the dealers, "get the billiard balls on the tables and try to look natural. There's a grand juror down stairs and he wants to come up." The kindly advice of the upholder of law was acted on. Cues and billiard balls were produced and the balls were knocked about in desultory fashion. But the grand juror did not come. He had evidently changed his mind. When the coast was once more clear the despised billiard balls were relegated to the racks, the crap outfit was produced and the patrons of the place resumed their dreams of busting the bank. Do you not agree that this was a peculiar sort of raid? Do not be too much surprised at the action of the policeman, however. You see, he may believe that the three men whose names I have heard mentioned are actually the proprietors of this place. In that event he might consider it to his interest to serve them.

When Money Will be Spent

There will be a great deal of money spent in this city when the sports from all over the country begin to arrive for the Jeffries-Johnson fight. A considerable part of this money will be spent in gambling. Already the professional gamblers are laying plans to gather it in. I have been told that four men, by no means inexperienced in this line, are preparing to open a gambling place in a hotel in the very heart of the city. Two of these men are local sports of more than ordinary prominence. Another used to be a gambler in Nome and has had considerable experience hereabouts. The fourth used to run a gambling place in Market street not far from the Baldwin Hotel. It is said that these men will rent portions of two floors of a certain hotel, not one of the big hostelries of course, and that by the time the sports begin to arrive for the fight all sorts of games will be installed, particularly craps, roulette and faro bank. It is even said that they have sent our circulars to sports all over the country inviting them to make their headquarters at a certain saloon during the time of the fight. From that particular saloon to the hotel where the gambling place is supposed to be in process of preparation is not a fatiguing walk. Paris of America? Why not for the sake of variety call it the Monaco of America?

A Rewarded Kindness

Louis Jacobs who used to be a deputy county clerk in Sacramento but who is now a prosperous merchant at Folsom, was in town the other day with a story which braces one's faith in human nature. When State Senator E. J. Emmons who had been sent to the penitentiary for accepting a bribe, managed to have himself paroled he needed twenty-five dollars to pay a legal fee. He applied to several of his old-time friends for the loan of that trifling sum, but discovered that these friends had been fair weather friends only; they would not come to his aid in adversity. Louis Jacobs was a friend of another stripe. He heard of Emmons' necessity and sent him fifty dollars. Emmons never forgot that kindness. Some time ago he went to the Bakersfield oil fields to rehabilitate his fortunes and quickly realized the possibilities of that wondrous region. One of the first to whom he communicated the news that there was big money to be made in Bakersfield was Louis Jacobs. On his sayso Jacobs bought fifty acres of land for a trifle. Now he has sold them for $750 an acre. The $37,500 which he has put in the bank he credits to the friendship of former Senator Emmons. Emmons thinks that the good turn he has done Jacobs is only a fitting return for the kindness which Jacobs did him in his direst need.

They Have Done Much for Sacramento

In the list of those men who have helped to give impetus to progress in the Sacramento Valley Eugene J. De Sabla Jr. and John Martin deserve a very prominent place. In the development of electric power, in the improvement of electric and gas lighting facilities, in the creation of a transportation system, in the exploitation of gold dredging properties and in the opening up of vast tracts of land formerly regarded as irreclaimable, De Sabla and Martin have left such an impress upon the Sacramento Valley as can never be effaced. Much of their work has been done against great odds; they have had to fight their way uphill; a great financial depression threatened to wipe out all their accomplishment when success was in sight. But they persevered because they were buoyed up by the consciousness of their right aims and they have won out to the tune of millions. Hydro-electric power was a new thing when De Sabla and Martin tackled it and their names will always be associated with its development. Some of their exploits read like romance. For instance, their Nevada plant on the south fork of the Yuba River was built in the record-breaking time of four months and five days after the scheme was conceived. It was the success of this plant which led to the construction of the great Colgate plant which is famous wherever engineers do congregate. Both De Sabla and Martin are strong personalities. De Sabla, for instance, is not a college-trained man. His career has been that of a self-trained employer, for he has always know what it was to give orders; he has never had to take them. It is said of him that he is always the last man to leave his office and that when he is on a trip of inspection he works all day and late into the night, showing a Napoleonic scorn of sleep, snatching it here and there when there is no work to hand. It is interesting to know that these men have not labored without appreciation. While their work has yielded a golden harvest it has also won the admiration and sympathy of all in the regions where it has been carried on.

The Bard's Curious Delusion

From the Bulletin's distinguished dramatic critic, Miss Frances Jolliffe, I learn that "As You Like It" was not played at the Greek Theater last Monday night as Shakespeare intended it to be played. "In the first place," says Miss Jolliffe, speaking as one on terms of intimacy with the bard, "he would have insisted that his play was written in blank verse—and you know how testy these poets are about their meters and accents." I have heard that Shakespeare wrote "As You Like It" in a great hurry, so great a hurry that the text is confusing. But not until I read Miss Jolliffe did I know that the great dramatist labored under the delusion that the play was all in blank verse.

Mr. Gotrox (sternly)—Your late employer advises me that you were not very faithful.

Typewriter (excitedly)—That's a lie! I never even thought of another man.

Spreading the Fame of Carmel

The Forest Theater Society of Carmel-by-the-Sea about which Michael Williams has written on another page, is already proving a good advertising medium for Carmel. Some weeks ago Herman Scheffauer wrote an article for the New York Sun on "Californians in Literature" in which he told a few things about our Carmel literary colony. This article opened the way for a letter from Michael Williams which almost filled a column in the Sun of June 3. In this letter Mr. Williams tells something of the theatrical project and expatiates at great length on the charms of Carmel. He says: "In the first place Carmel is in itself an inspiration. Charles Rollo Peters, the painter, who lived when at home in Monterey, where Robert Louis Stevenson once lived, and which is only four miles from Carmel and in itself surcharged with an artistic atmosphere and full of souvenirs of art and romance, for years made it a hobby to take globe trotters who visited the Hotel Del Monte at Monterey on drives along the coast from Monterey to Carmel for the purpose of ascertaining their opinions of that stretch of coast in comparison with foreign land and seascapes. The synthetic result of his inquiries was like this: His guests declared that while Japan, for instance, is able to show you spots more exotically picturesque, the Riviera places more romantically appealing, the Scandinavian countries regions of a wilder grandeur, yet for a combination of the beauties of forest, shore, mountain, valley, sky and sea there is not a place in the world that can surpass Carmel and its environs. Not only has this region the allure and not only does it diffuse the inspiration of natural beauty, it also radiates the subtler psychic influences of romance and art. Mirza Ali-Kuli Khan, the Persian Consul to Washington, who was at Carmel last summer, told me that the place closely resembles Mount Carmel in Palestine, which is so famous as a region where many of the world's great supermen, from Zoroaster to Abbas Effendi, have lived and worked. While we do not as yet claim to be a colony of supermen at Carmel, Cal., nevertheless Carmel and Monterey have been for long years past the haunt or home of poets, novelists, musicians, painters and lords of nature and of art, and thus it has evolved a soul which animates all that is done there."

The Poet and the Versifier

Last week I reprinted a poem written by Ethel Talbot, an English poet, entitled "Give Love Today" which she intended as an answer to Ina Coolbrith's poem "When the Grass Shall Cover Me." Since then my attention has been called to the following which appeared in the New York Times Review of Books, May 21st, over the signature of I. Henry Howe: "It is a distinct service to recall to our attention today Ina Coolbrith's beautiful poem 'When the Grass Shall Cover Me.' It seems, however, almost a sacrilege to couple with this poem as a 'reply' Ethel Talbot's 'Give Love Today.' The one has a haunting poetic quality which stamps its every line unmistakably as poetry, whereas the other has but very few lines which even approach the holy of holies.

A trial will convince you of the purity of Italian-Swiss Colony wines. They are the best.

INFORMATION by TELEPHONE

PEOPLE are not leaving so much to chance these days of universal telephone service. Instead of risking disapointment they telephone and get the facts.

Will school be held on a stormy morning, will your friend be in if you call, what does the weather man predict and when does the train leave—are samples of myriads of questions constantly passing over the wire, and being answered by the proper authorities.

There are also questions to be asked about the telephone service, how somebody can be reached over the Bell Long Distance Telephone and what it will cost, and similiar questions, which are being answered by the information operators.

Every Bell Telephone is the Centre of the System

Among those of the former generation to whom poetry means everything, there is a pronounced protest against calling every minor versifier or newspaper verse writer a 'gifted poet.' In fact there are not half a dozen real poets now writing in America. We need a new word to designate the producer of agreeable, promising, correct verse, if versifier is not deemed sufficiently dignified or adequate."

A Bad Day for Silk Hats

It was a parlous day for silk hats when Miss Genevieve Harvey became the bride of Ward Barron; at least I should judge so from what I saw of the wedding aftermath in the St. Francis Hotel. Young Scott was one of the first to arrive at the hostelry after the festivities and he warranted the impression that Bacchus had been on hand to help celebrate Hymen's innings. His silk hat was tilted rakishly on one side, revealing an incipient baldness. More than that it was pleated like an accordion. I gathered that its wearer had either sat on it or attempted to crush it under the delusion that he was at the opera instead of at a wedding. There is no need to say anything about Clare Payne. His hat was not more a sight than the rest of him. He must have had a bully time. But Cyril Tobin, though mellow, came with hat intact. Whether he envied the condition of Scott's headpiece I do not know, but he had no sooner entered the bar than he placed his silk hat on the mahogany and requested the servitor to smash it. Like a discreet servitor he of the white apron excused himself from compliance. Then young Tobin extended the same invitation to Billy Erb and found that athletic gentleman more accommodating. Erb's big fist smashed the hat flatter than a pancake. Tobin viewed the wreckage with the approval of a connoissuer and led playfully with his right to Erb's chin, but Erb blocked and countered with a right to the pit of Tobin's stomach and the post-nuptial frivolity was brought to an end.

A Cheerful Jeremias

I have just been honored with a lengthy communication by a Hoboken astrologer who calls himself "the nation's counselor." Having inspected the heavens and the motions of the planets this astrologer finds that commencing with June 22 "the United States will be the most fortunate of all the countries on earth this summer." Here is a cheerful prophecy when taken by itself but the context of the astrologer's letter fills me with cruel doubts. The fact is that although this country is to be the most fortunate of all during this summer, it is still to suffer a few trifling misfortunes, some of which I may as well cull from the letter for the benefit of my readers. It seems that Uncle Sam will have a little revenue trouble to contend with, that a bereavement will occur in the Cabinet, that panics and bank failures, if not bank robberies, will be in evidence, that much fraud and swindling will be prevalent, especially in the postal department, that the railroads will have much trouble and that there will be serious forest fires as well as mine disasters. Then again there will be trouble for Congress, for our soldiers and for our diplomats abroad. It seems that children will be unfortunate, but though they will be kidnaped their parents will recover them. There will be much trouble in theaters and other places of amusement. There will be fires in railroad trains and postoffices and the postal authorities are warned to look out for robberies and scandals. There will be a serious epidemic among cattle; also jail deliveries. Much trouble will occur in prisons, if not contagious diseases at least epidemics of throat trouble or typhoid. There will be atmospherical disturbances, shipwrecks and ocean collisions with great loss of life. Then there will be a great calamity at some watering place and fires at steamship piers. Farmers, miners, and real estate owners will suffer considerably. Earthquakes, electric storms and volcanic eruptions will occur. The laboring classes will be agitated and then pacified. President Taft will be slandered and discredited and is warned to look out for his health and that of his wife. There will be trouble in the navy too. During this same pleasant summer this country will lead in literature, science and art and some of our litterateurs, scientists and artists will get married. (Whether this is a misfortune the astrologer does not say.) Although some misfortune is to happen to Colonel Roosevelt there will be no war with Japan but there will be an uprising in the Philippines. It is quite evident that the most fortunate country in the world is going to have a crowded summer. I thank the astrologer for giving me the tip and am thinking of spending the summer in some less fortunate country.

cents, will be devoted to the big fund being raised by the order for the entertainment of the hundreds of thousands of visitors expected in San Francisco during the decennial festival. The committees in charge are confident that the coming celebration will eclipse the Portola Carnival of last year in every respect, the intention being to decorate the city as it never has been before, not even at the time of the Knights Templar Conclave. Stockton's Police Dogs

I have heard of the police dogs of Paris and their wonderful feats of instinct, but not until the other day did I know that there were two wonderfully trained police dogs in the State of California. Stockton is the city which boasts the possession of these remarkable animals. They were trained by and belong to Thomas Thompson, employed by the bankers of Stockton as a night watchman. To make the midnight rounds with Thompson and his dogs is a privilege and a pleasure. The animals are fine specimens of the Ayrdale terrier species, high-bred, keen-nosed and intelligent. Thompson speaks to them much as he would speak to a man and they are constantly on the alert to follow his directions. When the night watchman unlocks the door of a bank "Pepper" and "Prince" enter together, explore all the interior and return to the door to report that all is well. Thompson told me that if they found a man in the bank they would spring on him and summon their master by growling. He said that one night a workman was engaged in fixing a screen in one of the banks when the dogs made their rounds. Mistaking him for a burglar they sprang on him, pinning him to the ground until the watchman came and called them off. On another occasion the dogs stopped in front of a tobacco shop and tried vainly to squeeze between the iron palings that fenced an area from the sidewalk. Thinking that they were after a rat Thompson called them off. Next day it was found that a burglar had robbed the shop, obtaining one hundred dollars' worth of pipes. The burglar was caught and confessed that he was hiding in the area when the dogs endeavored to enter it. During the "Rush of Forty-Nine" celebration in Stockton the dogs captured a pickpocket who was making off through the crowded streets. At a word from their master they sprang at his throat and bore him to the ground. Thompson has complete confidence in his dogs and so have the bankers who employ Thompson. He is one of the highest paid watchmen in the State. "Pepper" and "Prince" are the pets of all the law-abiding and the terror of all the evil-doers in Stockton.

Local Scribes in Portland

A San Francisco newspaperman dropping into Portland, Oregon, finds himself very much in the swim, so far as former associations are concerned, for on every corner he is likely to bump into a former San Francisco colleague. There are at present in the northern metropolis the following well-known scribes engaged in rushing into print to prove that Portland is the greatest fresh-water port in the world: Hugh Hume, editor of The Spectator; James S. Tyler, news editor of the Journal; George M. Trowbridge, managing editor of the Journal; John J. Harrison, editor of the Portland Carman; Hugh Thompson, reporter on the Telegram; Harry Quinn, copy-reader on the Telegram; Frank McGettigan, copy-reader on the Oregonian; John Horan, editor of the Indaba, and "Dick" Cannon, city editor of the Telegram.

AUTHENTIC BUT ANONYMOUS

A Costly Picnic Prize

An attorney who practices law with a strong German accent used to be one of the pillars of St. Joseph's Church, and he may be still. When St. Joseph's had its annual parish picnic all the pillars of the church contributed prizes for the races and other contests of skill. The attorney contributed ten dollars' worth of legal advice as a prize for the fat women's race. When the race was run there was a close finish between two fat women and the announcement of the result was followed by a hair-pulling argument. The day after the picnic one of the women had the other arrested for battery and the defendant promptly sent for the attorney to come through with that ten dollars' worth of legal advice. He put up ten dollars' worth of defense and his client was convicted.

Miss Parrott and Mr. Tobin

Is Miss Abbie Parrott going to marry Edward Tobin? This is the question which is just now pleasantly agitating the Burlingame and San Mateo sets. Miss Parrott is a very charming young lady of unusual eligibility and Ed Tobin's is not the first name which has been linked with hers in matrimonial gossip. It was only recently that the experts in heart affairs noted decided cardiac symptoms in young Douglas Grant, the son of Mr. and Mrs. Joseph D. Grant and in looking for the cause they professed to find it in Miss Parrott. Then arose the rumor that Grant had proferred his heart and hand and had been refused, seeking balm for his wounded affections in a tour abroad. I have heard it said that Miss Parrott has let her kindly feelings toward Mr. Tobin become known to a few intimate friends, so let us not be too much surprised if an announcement is forthcoming. Ed Tobin is a brother of Joseph Sadoc and the late Robert Tobin. His father was Richard Tobin, one of the founders of the Hibernia Bank. Mrs. Mary Tobin, his mother, resides at the Fairmont. Miss Parrott's mother was Miss Minnie Donohue, daughter of the late Joseph A. Donohue Sr. She was an only daughter. Joseph A. Donohue, a brother, married Miss Christine Parrott, the aunt of the young lady in question. John Parrott, Miss Parrott's father, was the only son of John Parott, the well known banker now deceased. Miss Parrott recently arrived from abroad where her parents are at present living. She is visiting her grandmother Mrs. Abbie Parrott after whom she was named.

Claire Nichols' Wedding

No one's head was giddied by lavish ostentation at Claire Nichols' wedding in St. Matthew's church down at San Mateo last Thursday, yet young Charles Mills and his bride have the distinction of being the most popular bridal couple this year. They brought together more folks "as is folks" than any couple since the time that pretty Mary Scott married Walter Martin. The fashionists, the new society element and the climbers were conspicuously missing and both at the church and at the reception there was a noticeable absence of the stiff-necked hauteur and theatrical foppishness which the pretenders employ by way of winning favor with the real deities of society. Although it was the largest wedding in years the most cordial easy-mannered hospitality flavored the atmosphere of it. When the pretty bride—and the word "pretty" is used in its truest sense—walked down the aisle following the ceremony, she bowed to the right and left. The staid grown-ups, like William H. Crocker, George Howard and the Fosters from San Rafael, waved their hands in congratulation, and at the Nichols house the reception looked like a vast garden party. Too bad such a popular girl couldn't have been induced to remain here, and the only consolation is that young Mills is a capital fellow, entirely deserving of a splendid girl like Claire Nichols.

Women Variously Garbed

While the men at the wedding conformed strictly to the dictates of fashion, the women came in a variety of styles, some elaborately gowned, others in tailor-made frocks, quite a few in simple little linen outing dresses and the country element mostly in lingerie gowns. None of the bridesmaids wore a new gown, their dainty muslin frocks showing acquaintance with the tub, but looking just as sweet and summery for all that. The Nichols family was never of the "splurgy" set which makes an art of the whims of fashion, but the girls have been none the less popular for the old-fashioned simplicity of their attire. They have always been able to do much of their own sewing, making the daintiest of lingerie waists and other things in every way equal to the expensive stuff from Paris.

Miss Parrott's Weird Get-Up

Abbie Parrott who has been abroad so long that she speaks English with a foreign accent, came in rather late, just preceding the bridal party. Her name was whispered over the congregation and everyone stared at the young woman for she looked the incarnation of a goddess of the French school of fashion. The women couldn't take their eyes from her. She's grown so slender that she is scarcely more than a profile. Her dress was the latest dream evolved from the brain of a Paris creator of fashion. It was figured chiffon in several hues of gray shading to dull lavender, the material being swished about her like the wrapping sheets of the Egyptian mummies. The material didn't hang, it simply swirled about her slender height from the shoulders to the ankles, and just how she perumbulated in it passeth understanding. To top it off, a bold stroke of originality was achieved in the hat, a huge droopy grayish purple straw that was cocked over one eye, barely revealing the pointed bangs. The rest of the hair was done in an English bun. Only a girl with colossal self-reliance would dare such a trying style, but the chic Miss Parrott who would die sooner than cease being original, really looked immensely smart in the weird get-up.

Some other Costumes

Mrs. Patrick Calhoun was there, having chaperoned the young friends of her girls, taking them down in two private trolley cars. The trip east has done Mrs. Calhoun a world of good, giving her a rosy complexion that makes her look unusually young. She wore a gown that was particularly becoming. It was a figured white and black chiffon, the lower part of the skirt being black chiffon with which she wore a big black hat with plumes encircling the crown. The black picture hat was much in evidence at the wedding, for nothing sets off a summer gown so prettily. Mrs. Walter Martin wore one with a lavender foulard, and Helene Irwin who came down in the Calhoun car looked like a little old-fashioned belle of the picturesque period of early last century. Over a coral silk dress she wore an old French brocade shawl, probably the wedding shawl of her great-grandmother. It was made over into a kimono wrap with a narrow bit of fur at the end of the sleeves and down the front. It was amazingly becoming, even if it did look a bit wintry.

Templeton Crocker who provided the white gardenias for the men at the wedding from his own gardens, simply couldn't keep his eyes from his vivacious little fiancee. To see the two together absolutely refutes all that tommyrot about the engagement being an affair of finances, for if ever there was a couple deeply in love with each other it is these two.

Mrs. Chrystal Harrison left for the East yesterday. After visiting her son Ralph who is a lieutenant of Coast Artillery at Fort Munroe, Virginia, she will sail on June 16 for Paris to join her sister Mrs. Charles Shields. The two ladies will go to the Tyrol for the Passion Play.

Marrying Amy

The question, Who is going to marry Amy Crocker-Ashe-Gillig-Gouraud next is absorbing attention on both sides of the continent. Everybody knows that somebody has to become her husband. The world knows that she is one of those impetuous people that have no time to practice celibacy. She came into the world to enjoy herself in her own way, and after setting her nursemaid a bad example in flirtation and shocking her governess by her girlish intrigues she took a flyer in matrimony with Porter Ashe as an associate. Since then marrying has been her chief occupation, and she has inspired many genuine passions. Recently she has been at liberty, but now come rumors of another engagement with considerable uncertainty regarding the individual over whose imagination she is exercising her imperious way. A man named Emerson Foote is thought by some to be the one. By others Melville Ellis is credited with having won her favor, while not a few declare that it would not surprise them if she were to marry an Arab Sheik of Damascus. The only suitor known to local fame is Melville Ellis, a musical comedy performer who began his stage career at the old Tivoli where he played accompaniments at rehearsals. He is noted for his genius for clothes and for his success in the role of Archie in the Toreador.

Mrs. Oelrichs and Her Friends

One of the eastern papers stated recently that Mrs. Hermann Oelrichs had "put the California riffraff, which once held such high place in her affections, behind her." This is a statement not calculated to fill with pleasure those members of the California colony in New York who have enjoyed the favor of this social arbitress. To be classed as riffraff is very disagreeable, particularly if you have designs on society. It is an odious word, suggestive of a herding together that is inconsistent with the cherished exclusiveness that is the hall-mark of society. I wonder just what exiled Californians are included in Mrs. Oelrichs' riffraff? A list would be an interesting document to con. One of Mrs. Oelrichs' prime favorites was Addie Mizner, a man of such good humor that even to be classed as riffraff would scarcely ruffle his jovial front. I think that Addie is so comfortably fixed now that he does not need Mrs. Oelrichs' patronage. But there are others who would fain lean on her for support in their social aspirations. If it be true that she has dismissed them from her favor they will scarcely maintain their equilibrium. I understand that Mrs. Oelrichs is giving much of her attention to Harry Black, a great pet in New York and Newport circles. For the last two months they have been much together in public. At a recent dinner given by this young man Mrs. Oelrichs occupied the seat of honor. If there were any Californians present at that dinner, riffraff or otherwise, they were not of sufficient importance to be listed by the New York bavardes.

During the Nichols-Mills wedding at San Mateo a lady remarked aloud in the church that James Jenkins, Wharton Thurston and William Duncan were the three handsomest ushers she had ever seen. Miss Pauline Coppee overheard the remark and was elated for the three young men are her cousins.

The Price of Social Recognition

A friend who has just crossed the continent brings me some interesting information regarding the methods to which wealthy women resort for the purpose of breaking into the exclusive social corral of New York. He tells me that New York is full of women with more millions than brains who stop at nothing to attain the sacred precincts. These women, he says, form the principal support of the big hotels where none but millionaires may stop for any length of time without crippling their finances. He told me the name of a woman who during the past year spent thirty thousand dollars to accomplish her darling wish. Nearly all of this money was paid to a New Yorker who has the social password and is not averse from trading on his connections. As a result of her expenditures the parvenue has had the pleasure on several occasions of touching finger tips with Mesdames Fish, Oelrichs, Ladenburg and others. Despite the enjoyment of this privilege the gilded climber is still insecure in her position and it may cost her another thirty thousand dollars to maintain during the next season the place which she has bought for herself on the edge of the charmed circle. I do not intend to waste any moral sentiments on this sort of thing. The woman in question could not conceivably spend her money for any good purpose. Such a woman is incapable of judicious charity and it is surely a question with her of parting with wealth in one or another foolish way. She might just as well give it to her needy social sponsor as cast it to the winds in any other form of extravagance. Perhaps when she has depleted her fortune she will come to a dim realization of the truth that she has been a fool and that is a discovery which many people have to make at a high cost.

In the Social Spotlight

Miss Edith Pickering of the Presidio of Monterey has been spending the week in town as the guest of Miss A. D. Ames at the latter's apartment at the Hotel Victoria.

Mrs. Duke Baxter is entertaining as her guests at the Hotel Victoria Mrs. Charles F. Eaton and Miss Dorothy Eaton of Santa Barbara.

Mr. and Mrs. Frank Ohmstead of Los Angeles were among the week's arrivals at the Hotel Victoria. Mr. Ohmstead is the city engineer of Los Angeles. Mrs. Albertine Dubois is another Los Angeles guest at the Hotel Victoria.

Mr. and Mrs. Murray Innes of San Francisco motored down to the Hotel Vendome to spend the week end with Mr. Innes' mother, Mrs. Alexander Innes who is there for the summer.

General John McClellan, U. S. A., came up from the Hawaiian Islands with Mrs. McClellan and his daughters, Miss Rose and Josephine, to spend the month of June and July at the Vendome.

Col. D. M. Appel, U. S. A., with Mrs. Appel is spending the week end at the Vendome.

Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Baird of Berkeley drove down to the Vendome staying over a few days before continuing on to Santa Cruz.

Sir Robert Hadfield and his party are still at Del Monte and Sir Robert, though a very busy man, plays golf nearly all day long with Major Walters.

Mr. and Mrs. Fletcher F. Ryer and Miss Doris Ryer, from the Fairmont, have taken apartments for the summer at Del Monte. They are all enthusiastic golfers spending hours every day on the links, and Miss Doris is delighting her friends by her ability.

Mrs. Chester Williams and her three charming children are domiciled at Del Monte for the summer.

Major A. F. Perry, George E. Bennett, R. A. Messerah and James P. Sweeney last Saturday motored to Paraiso Hot Springs to spend the week end.

Mrs. Hugo Mansfeldt left Naples June 3 on the North German Lloyd steamer Konig Albert for New York, whence, after a stay of only a few days, she will resume her journey to her home in San Francisco. Her travels in the Sahara during the last year and a half, where she visited oases hardly ever reached by Europeans, have been very interesting. She will reach San Francisco the latter part of June. Mr. Hugo Mansfeldt has been spending the last few days at the Vendome in San Jose.

Mrs. M. B. Thornton, Miss L. E. Thornton and Mr. T. A. Thornton of Canton, Ill., are spending a week at the Vendome.

Judge William C. Van Fleet and Horace G. Platt motored down last Friday for the week end at Del Monte.

Mr. and Mrs. W. L. Hathaway, Walter Hathaway and Miss L. M. Nicholai journeyed to Paraiso Hot Springs last week in their Royal tourist.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry T. Scott together with Mr. and Mrs. J. T. Scott spent the week end at Byron Hot Springs. They made the trip in their automobile.

Miles Standish, direct descendant of the Puritan, a name rendered immortal in Longfellow's beautiful poem, arrived at the Potter during the week in his Pierce-Arrow car. Mr. Standish resides at Plymouth, Mass., but has a beautiful California home at Piedmont.

Mr. and Mrs. W. H. T. Huie and Mrs. Huie's mother, Mrs. Bies, of San Francisco are at the Potter Hotel, having gone south to attend the marriage of Mr. Huie's brother, Edward Mercer Huie of San Francisco, to Miss Elizabeth Hernster, which was quietly solemnized at the home of the bride's mother.

Mr. Walter Fox and party of San Francisco arrived in a Thomas motor car and are registered at the Potter Hotel.

Mr. Hiram W. Johnson, Lincoln-Roosevelt candidate for governor, with John M. Eshleman, candidate for railroad commissioner, Horace J. O'Brien, for secretary of state, and A. J. Wallace for lieutenant governor, spent Saturday night at the Potter, when they addressed a large representative gathering.

Mr. and Mrs. Webster Jones and Mrs. M. Murphy motored to Aetna Springs recently.

Among the recent additions to the "Service Set" at the Fairmont Hotel are Commander and Mrs. M. C. Gorgas of Mare Island, accompanied by Miss Mary Gorgas, Commander and Mrs. S. W. Koester, U. S. N., Lieutenant and Mrs. R. W. Farvell, U. S. N., Lieutenant and Mrs. S. A. Clement, U. S. N., Dr. and Mrs. Sankey Bacon, U. S. N., and Commander and Mrs. E. W. Eberle, U. S. N.

Mrs. J. D. Peters and her charming daughter Miss Anna are at the Fairmont, having come down from their country home near Stockton for a few days.

C. A. Spreckels of New York is at the Fairmont having come out from the East the early part of the week. He is planning to be on the coast for some time.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Josselyn and Miss M. McGasock visited Aetna Springs by automobile recently.

Among the guests at the Fairmont from nearby places are Mr. and Mrs. E. D. Beylard and Miss Beylard of San Mateo, Mr. and Mrs. John Barneson, also of San Mateo, and Mrs. R. A. Steiner of Belvedere.

The tea room of the Hotel Victoria has become very popular. Tea is served every afternoon between three and five by little Chinese tea girls. Mrs. Defendorf entertained Miss Jeanette Powell Tuesday afternoon. There were twelve invited guests.

Thirty young men started on Thursday from the Palace Hotel en route to the Esterling ranch near Guerneville for a week's camping. They are of the Gray Stone Castle, Knights of King Arthur. The party also included six chaperons and four society belles of San Rafael. One of the young women is a favorite society bridesmaid and maid of honor, Miss Louisiana Foster who has already "stood up" with several of the prominent brides since Easter. She has "caught the bride's bouquet" many times this year, and her girl friends have prophisied she will be married before the year is out, although Miss Foster is not known to be engaged. Now they are wondering if one of the thirty Knights of King Arthur will touch her heart. The other young women are the Misses Dora Thayer, Melaine Lancel and Georgia Wintringham ,while the chaperons are the Rev. Lynn T. White and Mrs. White, Mr. and Mrs. Karl Kraft and Mr. and Mrs. R. B. Carr. All are socially prominent on both sides of the bay.

The members of the Beringer Musical Club were heard to excellent advantage at a concert given last Tuesday night at Century Hall. A varied program of vocal and piano numbers was presented and exquisitely rendered by the following members: Miss Irene De Martini, Miss Zdenka Buben, Miss Frances Westington, Mrs. H. J. Widenmann, Mrs. Lois Patterson-Wessitsh, Messrs. Harry Hultmann, Melton Mowbray, Harry Samuels and Prof. Joseph Beringer.

Mr. and Mrs. Harry R. Bostwick of Seoul, Korea, who are among the best known members of the social set at San Francisco motored down last Sunday with their father, Mr. H. E. Bostwick, and Mr. and Mrs. James A. Levensaler and Mrs. E. A. Judson, all of San Francisco, and spent the day at Del Monte.

The Palace Hotel seems to be making a record in brides. The latest is Miss Edith Todd, a stenographer at the holstery who last Saturday became the bride of James H. Mepham, a well known tea dealer of the city. A romantic feature of the wedding is the fact that the bride, who is a beauty of the large yet slender blond type, works in the department of public stenographers at the Palace. It was there that Mepham met her. At the end of a three months' courtship, most of it carried on at the Palace, the two walked out for luncheon one day, and instead of lunching were married.

Governor and Mrs. Gillett were among the recent arrivals at the Fairmont, having come down from Sacramento for a few days.

Miss Dorothy Innis, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William Reynolds Innis and Mr. Davenport Gordon Bromfield, were married at the Innis residence in New York recently. The bride's mother was before her marriage Miss Dora Studebaker. Her sister, Miss Janet Innis was married two years ago to Mr. Will-

A Comedienne and a Comic Episode

By Theodore Bonnet

At a feast where every dish is a triumph of the culinary art even a gourmet may fail to go into raptures over the piece de resistance. By the same token Vesta Victoria almost fails of distinction at the Orpheum this week. The bill being one of almost uniform excellence the famous English comedienne derives no advantage from contrast. Yet it requires no special talent for discovering merit to discern that in which Vesta Victoria abounds. She is an artist of the first rank with many natural attributes, gifts of a generous Providence, chief among which is a keen sense of humor. In her manner and method she is very much less alien than most of the music hall artists that have come to us from London, and she is consequently much less of a surprise than was Alice Lloyd. She is as different from that incarnation of daintiness as a contadina of the campagna is from a French nursery maid; as different as Minerva is from Venus. However, you can like both equally well if you have sense enough to understand that in the matter of admiration it is not bad to have several maladies. Physically the two comediennes are equally charming. Vesta Victoria is small of stature, trim and vivacious, with hands seductively white and delicate, which she employs in a way that gives great animation to all she does. Her face and figure, mien and manner, altogether allure. The comedy that she gives us is a very mild and refined form of the Elfie Fay brand. Her drollery is accomplished with no facial distortions, no unpleasant mimetic arabesques, but she depends for effects in a large measure on freakish costumes that give her a grotesque air. The art of Vesta Victoria is the art of burlesque. In this art her gamut is wide. In each of her several characterizations there are deft touches that remind you of the turn of a pencil by which the genius of an artist puts a world of meaning in a drawing. It was last Monday night that I witnessed the performance at the Orpheum, and I am glad it was not any other night, else I should have missed an episode that was highly diverting. On Monday night Mr. Edward Abeles, an actor-r, threw a conniption fit in full view of the audience. Mr. Abeles is a very serious actor-r, who plays a very serious part to which he can impart vraisemblance without an effort, being a very serious-minded gentleman. The part is that of a dumb youth who is under arrest for the murder of a woman and child of which he is innocent but which he witnessed. To convince the district attorney of his innocence he gives a pantomimic performance of the incidents of the tragedy, and among other things that he illustrates is the nursing of a babe at its mother's breast. The sketch is good melodrama, and Mr. Abeles gives an excellent, most realistic and touching performance. When it was over Monday night, he responded to applause and made a speech. "I break silence," he said, "for the first time since I have appeared in this piece, for I don't believe in disillusioning an audience. I wish to thank the audience for its generous applause, and also to pay my compliments to the idiot who laughed at the most godly thing next to God Almighty in this world." The audience seemed stupefied by this outburst. "What does he mean?" was the question stamped on every countenance. In all probability Mr. Abeles wished to have it understood that it was his purpose to rebuke somebody who laughed at the moment when the baby was supposed to be nursing. So absorbed was I in the performance that I was not distracted by laughter. I am not sure that there was any laughter. But it doesn't make any difference whether anybody laughed or not. Suffice it that Mr. Abeles gave us occasion to laugh immediately after harrowing up our feelings with a bit of tragedy. I welcome opportunities to laugh at actor-r's who conceive that they are doing the public a great favor to entertain for hire and who assume also that the emotions of an audience must be precisely such as they seek to produce with their craftsmanship. Now I do not hesitate to confess that I was in no laughing mood at the time that Mr. Abeles after tugging at his shirt-front gave an imitation of a mother holding her babe at her breast. But my emotions are exceptionally susceptible. Now that I am beyond the range of Mr. Abeles' magnetic current, I can smile myself as I conjure up the scene that he so vividly depicted, and I cannot regard it as a sacrilege for anybody to laugh in the midst of the performance. Why should Mr. Abeles assume that the person whose risibles were affected laughed at the idea of a mother nursing her babe? Is it not quite as reasonable to assume that the person was merely laughing at Mr. Abeles. It is not improbable that the person complained of has an exceptionally fine taste in histrionic art, and is to be moved only by talent of the very highest quality. On the other hand he may be an idiot. But even Mr. Abeles is not without his shortcomings. Obviously he is lacking in that essential of the histrionic art—a sense of humor—for he does not appreciate the humor of his presumption that he never fails to create an illusion. The untimely laughter of the ebullient unknown may be conclusive of intellectual obfuscation but how shall we characterize the naivete of the actor who told an audience that he is usually discreetly silent because he hates to dissillusionize an audience? These are reflections that I commend to Mr. Abeles in the hope that he may assuage himself and endeavor so to perfect himself in his art as to compel universal sympathy in whatever characterization he may essay.

SCENE IN WILLIAM COLLIER'S NEW PLAY "A LUCKY STAR" AT THE COLUMBIA

Stage

Maude Adams as Rosalind

Our emotions are wild lawless things, frequently led astray by the imp of the perverse. When we would command them they overmaster us and when we welcome their control they fling away and leave us cold, unresponsive. Too often it happens so in the theater. But there are also times when our emotions play upon us as a master of music on a perfect instrument. Then with ready sympathy we respond to their urgings of joy and sorrow, of laughter and of tears, of love and hatred, of admiration and contempt. The occasions when we are thus attuned are rare for they depend on a harmony of time and place and person. Preeminently Miss Maude Adams has the power of compelling our emotions. Her personality is compact of charm that wins every heart. It would be difficult to imagine her in a part which would lack the sympathy of an audience; it would be just as difficult to imagine her playing any part ill. She is a great actress, the greatest in America, and we have yet to discover her limitations. Lady Babbie, Peter Pan, the Eaglet, Phoebe Throssle, Maggie Shand and Rosalind, the parts are sufficiently diverse to test the depth and breadth of any actress's ability. Where is the actress in America who could play them all as well as Maude Adams? The best of her parts, to my mind, are Peter Pan and L'Aiglon, both boy parts. Miss Adams wears mannish attire well; no actress who does not can ever hope to play Rosalind convincingly. If there is fault to be found with her Rosalind, it is simply this that she wears mannish attire too well. Paradoxical as it may seem, Rosalind should not wear her doublet and hose too convincingly. Yet Miss Adams is almost as much a boy in Rosalind as in Peter Pan or L'Aiglon. Herein she does not conform to the plan of the poet. "A gallant curtle-axe upon my thigh, a boar spear in my hand; and—in my heart lie there what woman's fear there will—we'll have a swashing and a martial outside" Rosalind says when she decided to don doublet and hose. It is evident that Shakespeare intended some of her woman's fear to show. "Dost thou think, though I am caparisoned like a man, I have a doublet and hose in my disposition?" is another speech of hers which expresses this intention of the dramatist. Yet Miss Adams seems to have too much of the doublet and hose in her disposition. The suggestion of a swashing and martial air is easier for her than the delineation of that timidity which any woman disguised as a man would naturally feel. Rosalind did not put off as much of her shrinking femininity with her skirts as Miss Adams would have us believe. She does not become as much a boy as Peter Pan, yet Miss Adams makes her so. The traditional stage business by which the bashfulness of a woman in man's habiliments is emphasized did not fit well with her Rosalind. You felt that she was perfectly at ease, that she was only simulating bashfulness. Her stride was a man's stride, not the stride of a woman affecting the manly bearing. Perhaps Miss Adams has played boys too long to be the perfect Rosalind. This is not to say, however, that she is not a charming Rosalind, a great Rosalind. Indeed criticism suspends its workings in her presence; it is only in the cold afterthought that flaws are found. Miss Adams' Rosalind dominated the performance of "As You Like It" at the Greek Theater and it was a wonderful performance. The stage management was a triumph, the company was splendid. The Touchstone of Peyton Carter was not the roynish clown of tradition any more than Miss Adams was the Rosalind of tradition. Mr. Carter was a mirthless philosopher in motley, albeit the cause of mirth in his audience. Touchstone should at least smile a little, to my mind. These differences are no drawbacks to a Shakespearian performance. They stimulate thought and send us to the book shelf. Anything which causes us to brush up our Shakespeare is not to be despised.

Virginia Harned in "Anna Karenina"

Miss Virginia Harned is an actress of long experience in emotional roles but her mightiest efforts could not make "Anna Karenina" plausible. If I remember aright Tolstoi in the sere and yellow repudiated this fruit of his ripe genius. What he would do if he ever saw the play for which Edmond Giraud is responsible passes guessing. It is a poor play for many reasons, chief of them this, that it fails to win the sympathy of the audience. Miss Harned weeps but there are none to weep with her. In the end she kills herself and the audience lets her die without a thrill of sorrow. She plays the part of a woman more sinned against than sinning but her misfortunes are a good deal of a bore. She has broken the conventions but remains on good terms with her modiste. She maunders over her child in a faultless black gown and goes to her death in a faultless white one. In such solemn moments one should not think of clothes but in the absence of sympathetic turmoil the mind dwells on accessories. Nobody thought of the clothes of Iris in that tumultuous scene where Maldonado smashed the furniture. Miss Harned in that scene gripped her audience so tightly that they had thoughts only for her plight and eyes only for her tear-stained face. But "Iris" was a great play whereas "Anna Karenina" is a mighty dull one. It is not worthy of Miss Harned's emotional gifts. It is not worthy of Mr. William Courtenay either. He has to play the part of a cad and he plays it without enthusiasm which he would not do if it were the part of a cad worth playing well. Happily Miss Harned and Mr. Courtenay, with the fine Alcazar stock company, are to give us other plays, so we need not repine too much at the dulness of "Anna Karenina." But the playwright ought to keep out of Tolstoi's reach. The wrath of that old man can be terrible.

Margaret Anglin Coming to the Columbia

On Monday at the Columbia William Collier begins the second and last week of his local engagement in "A Lucky Star." On Monday evening, June 20, Margaret Anglin will begin an engagement of two weeks. She will be seen in two plays, "The Awakening of Helena Richie" and "Mrs. Dane's Defense." The former is new to San Francisco. It was adapted by Charlotte Thompson, a Californian writer, from Margaret Deland's novel. The latter play has already been seen here with Miss Anglin in the leading role. It is by Henry Arthur Jones and has been accounted one of his masterpieces. Miss Anglin's engagement will begin with "The Awakening of Helena Richie" which she will give for eleven evening performances and four matinees, while "Mrs. Dane's Defense" will be given at two special matinees on Friday, June 24 and Friday, July 1.

Vesta Victoria as Chanticleer

Next week Miss Vesta Victoria will offer at the Orpheum an entirely new repertoire of songs, the most original of which will be "The Chanticleer Ditty." She will present a typically Victoria song with the famous Rostand play as the theme. Her Chantecler costume cost $600 and is a wonderful creation made entirely by hand out of real feathers. Among the new acts will be Gripolati's aerial ballet. It opens with the beautiful butterfly ballet followed by a graceful specialty by Mlle. Floretta, the premiere coryphee, and concludes with the gorgeous dove ballet in which live pigeons are used for the final pictures and figures. H. Franklin and the Standards are acrobats and dancers. Fred Warren and Al Blanchard, two minstrel and musical comedy stars, will amuse in a novel act. Jovial Fred Warren introduces an impersonation of a colored soubrette. Hal Merritt, "The College Boy from Ipswich," will also contribute to the entertainment. He is a cartoonist of rare skill. Next week will be the last of Paul Spadoni, Lyons and Yosco and of De Witte Kaplan and Herbert Walter's one act drama "The Code Book."

Miss Harned's Second Week

Virginia Harned will commence her second week at the Alcazar next Monday evening when "An American Widow," a three-act comedy by Kellett Chambers, will be presented for the first time in San Francisco. In the title part Miss Harned will have an opportunity to show that her art is versatile, for the nature of Mrs. Elizabeth Killigrew, youthful relict of an aged millionaire, is very different from that of Anna Karenina. There are many amusing situations and scenes in the comedy, and the lines are full of brightness. Miss Harned was led to adopt "An American Widow" by the success it scored in New York and because of the opportunities it affords for display of her abilities as a comedienne. William Courtenay is nicely fitted to his part and all the favorite members of the Alcazar company have congenial roles.

The Savoy to Reopen

John Cort who is now president of the National Theater Owners' Association, controlling sixteen hundred playhouses in the United States and Canada, writes F. W. Busey, resident manager of the Savoy Theater, that when the McAllister street home of amusement reopens on the fourteenth of August it will be constantly supplied with the very best attractions before the public. Up to the first of August the Savoy may be rented for concerts, lectures and entertainments of all descriptions

Chinese Carnival at Idora

With gay colored flags, draperies and lanterns, Idora Park is offering to its patrons this week a Chinese carnival. The famous dragon parades the grounds nightly and with the illuminated fish, the lion's head and the escort of a Chinese band which rivals Ohlmeyer's in volume if not in harmony, forms one of the most attractive features of the display. In the band shell a Chinese vaudeville show is presented. San Yip Po, said to be the greatest Chinese tragedienne of the day, plays an important role. With the matinee and evening performances on Sunday the carnival will come to a close. Ohlmeyer's band will be heard for the last time on Sunday night. Beginning Monday evening, Thaviu will bring his famous Russian musicians to Idora for a limited engagement.

A factulty for committing lines to memory with ease is a great necessity with an actor. Margaret Anglin has a very facile "study" for she is able to acquire the words of a heavy four act part after a few readings. The words of her role in "The Great Divide" were studied and memorized in three hours.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—The severe declines in the stock market were caused by liquidation based on the action of the President who instructed the Attorney-General to bring suits to restrain the railways from advancing freight rates. The action was entirely unexpected as it was thought that President Taft would allow the matter to take its course according to law. The Interstate Commerce law gives the railways the right to advance rates, but on complaint the Interstate Commerce Commission orders a hearing, and if it decides that the rate is unreasonable, it can substitute a reasonable rate. The news other than that from Washington has been quite favorable. Under favorable conditions the good crop news that is coming out and the general decline in the commodity prices would make for a betterment in the securities market, but good news no longer stimulates public interest and the market does not respond to naturally bullish information. While we are still hopeful and disposed to refrain from pessimism we are not quite so cheerful over the market situation and rather advise the lightening of loads on all up-swings until the horizon is clearer and some adverse factors are removed; but at the present level, and especially on any further recessions we unquestionably think the market a purchase for a good turn. For the railroad question is going to be settled—and be settled right—and we don't believe that in the end the President is going to hurt the railroads by advising any drastic measures.

Wheat—Declines in wheat were halted last week and the market scored a temporary and partial recovery. This was principally because of caution on the part of the bear speculators, the technically over-sold condition of the market and the reappearance of the final demands from millers. Important concessions from the prices asked in the Northwest have been made here by the owners of the wheat, thus attracting all of the spring wheat demands that are likely to be disclosed in this section for the weeks remaining of the 1909-10 crop. Serious minded grain men do not look upon the prospect for the coming crop year with a great deal of pleasure except as they are warehousemen or carriers. In a very few weeks, probably less than a fortnight, weather permitting, the first run of new wheat will be seeking such market centers as have the funds and the warehousing facilities to handle the property. There is a very poor outlook for a domestic milling demand and none at all for export unless prices are vastly reduced.

Corn—Cold weather in a large part of the corn belt imparted a great deal of strength to the corn market up to the middle of last week, but values were turning downward again toward the last. Weakness at the last was chiefly because the trade here awakened to the fact that while the country was willing to flood the trade with reports that the crop was making a poor growth, was a poor stand and that further replanting was being done, it was sending in no orders to buy corn.

Cotton—Reports on the cotton acreage up to June 1 show an increase in the same of 3.4 per cent. It is estimated that 88 per cent of the total area had come up to a stand on this date, planting, except in isolated cases, being completed. We hear no more of the alleged damage by the big storm of about a month ago and all the re-planting necessary (which seems to be confined to Alabama and Louisiana) has been completed and the cotton is up, although in these States there are a few complaints of irregular stands. Between May 14 and June 1 rains fell in all cotton-producing territories and were high beneficial, although accompanied by low temperatures. What is needed now is warm dry weather. Although lacking a few days of being as far advanced, the crop and field conditions compare favorably with last year. There is no question but what the weather continues to be the dominating influence, but from the outlook and the continued good news from reliable private sources we believe that there will be a bumper crop and in consequence the prices are too high and a big drop may be looked for at any time.

Copper—The general metal market has had another dull week. Metal conditions continue to parallel the industrial tendencies. The impression still holds that the Copper Producers' figures for May will show a more encouraging situation in copper than has been expected. Undoubtedly one of the most striking features of the whole copper situation is the disposition to accept the surplus, once so troublesome, as no very harmful item in itself. While the European rate of consumption is increasing the foreign surplus is being used to apply to the American stock, under the present uncertainty in the price of metal. Reorganization of the copper metal market has been much demanded, but the difficulties in the way have loomed large. It is beginning to appear that stability will come in the good old-fashioned way through the operation of the ordinary laws of trade rather than through the mergers and combinations. The result is likely to be more satisfactory to consumers than producers, though not necessarily bad for the latter. At present production is running about 10 per cent ahead of consumption. The copper companies have got into the position of merchants who carry shelves stocked with goods and must await customers. In the meantime pressure to sell is great and steady and back of it lies the new order of things in mining; which we think promises better prices for stocks of good standard and well-managed companies.

It's Such a Big Place

The hero of a story which has been told of Archbishop Ireland is really that witty churchman Bishop Talbot, "the Cowboy Bishop," whose powers of repartee and whose churchly devotion made him famous among those people of whom he has so delightfully written in his reminiscent volume, "My People of the Plains."

"Where in h—— have I seen you?" demanded a rough-looking man, meeting Bishop Talbot one evening in the crowded single street of a mining town.

To which the Bishop suavely retorted, to the shouting delight of the bystanders:

"What part of h—— do you come from, sir?"

venue in my particular case from the San Francisco to the Sacramento, or Sixth Judicial District. On the reading of its title its introduction was objected to by the entire San Francisco delegation of nine, composed of members of the Vigilance Committee, most of them being Black Republicans, and all of them elected in the furor of the mob ascendancy in that city. They were seconded in their objections by all of the Black Republicans on the floor, every one of whom was a sympathizer with the Vigilance Committee. The question then became, under the rules, "shall the bill be rejected?" upon which the "ayes" and "noes" were demanded, and it was found that the Democracy, who were largely in the majority in the House, with a few exceptions* voted in mass in the negative, while every Black Republican voted the other way. Thus, notwithstanding many of my friends were absent, the rejection of the bill was negatived by a handsome majority. Prior to the putting of the question, the Hon. Gaven D. Hall, member for El Dorado County, and Chairman of the Judiciary Committee, made one of the most able and effective arguments in my behalf that had been heard that session; and I cannot refrain from here returning him my thanks for the same.

Another, though much lesser light in the Legislature, Mr. Patrick, of Tuolumne County, though calling himself a Democrat, made some severe remarks against me, and afterwards put himself to the trouble of having a most scurrilous speech against me published as having been delivered by him. Those who heard him, however, have only to read the speech to know that he never delivered it. The scurrility of it is the only thing about it that bears his mark. The grammar and diction are far superior to anything that was ever heard from him by his fellow members.

What induced this member to put himself out of the way to appear as my especial oppressor, I do not know. I know that I never wronged him in my life. Indeed, I never knew him until I saw him as my enemy, when I was pleading to the Legislature for protection from a blood-thirsty mob. I suppose there is only one way to account for his course, and that is by giving him credit for a most inordinate passion for "bunkum." Indeed, his desire to be on the popular side of every question must be very strong, if I am correctly informed; for I understand that when the rebellion first broke out in San Francisco, as the feeling was rather in favor of law and order in his county, he joined a military company called the "Sonora Greys," and also carried his son to their armory, professing his willingness to hold himself and his family in readiness to respond to the call of the Governor, and shed his blood if necessary, in support of the laws. The feeling altered, however, in Tuolumne. When, through the influence of the Vigilance press, the public mind in that section became poisoned, and law and order was no longer popular, the views of Mr. Patrick underwent a sudden change, and he became one of the members from his county in the Legislature. I am deeply pained to learn that he was defeated the other day in Tuolumne County, for the Democratic nomination for sheriff. When such consistent and reliable citizens are willing to enter the public service, (which is rarely), the people should by all means improve the opportunity to secure their efficient aid in the administration of the laws, particularly in the high and responsible office of sheriff.

After this signal defeat of the "Reformers," the bill was referred to the Judiciary Committee of the House. Two days afterward it was reported back with an amendment making it a general law, giving to all other citizens the same privilege of moving for a change of venue without personally appearing in court, but leaving with the judges the selection of the districts where their cases were to be tried. This, of course, contemplated fully as much fairness and justice as my case required, and the opponents of my petition being I suppose, by this time ashamed of their narrow mindedness and injustice, took this for an excuse to withdraw their opposition to the bill, and it passed the House without a dissenting voice as amended by the Judiciary Committee. On the next day the bill was reported to the Senate, and the day following a motion was made in that body to suspend the rules and consider it at once. As I desire to state the facts in this narrative as they were, and to do full justice to all, I will here record that Senators Woodworth and Sullivan, both from San Francisco, and elected by the Vigilance Committee, voted with the majority in favor of the motion. So manifest was the necessity and justice of the measure that they, bitterly as they were prejudiced against me, could

* The Democratic State Journal, in commenting upon the proceedings the next day, held the following language:

Edward McGowan.—A bill was introduced in the Assembly, yesterday, the effect of which would be to grant Edward McGowan a trial in some county out of San Francisco. There is no doubt that if McGowan were taken to San Francisco he would be seized by the mob and hung, without judge or jury; or, were he to be regularly tried there, no jury could be obtained that would not be prejudiced on one side or the other. He desires that his case should be investigated by an impartial jury, and his request ought to be granted. We pity the man who has so little sensibility, or sense of justice, as to vote against the granting of such a reasonable favor. The bitterest fate that could be desired for him would be that he himself should, by some accidental circumstance, be left to the tender mercies of a mob jury.

We were sorry to see law and order democrats vote against the measure, influenced thereto probably by the fear expressed that its passage would do injury to their party. Pshaw! It has long been a household word among us that "Democracy oppresses no weakness," and was never ashamed to associate with mercy. Besides, it ought not to be considered a party measure, but one which every man, of whatsoever party, ought eagerly to approve not oppose it. Notwithstanding a majority voted in the affirmative, it was not sufficient; it requiring by the Senate rules, a two-thirds vote to suspend a rule. It being toward the close of the session, and other business pressing, that vote could not be obtained. Accordingly on motion of Mr. Coffroth, the bill was referred to the Judiciary Committee, with instructions to report it back the next day. In accordance with these instructions the Committee reported it on the eighth of March, recommending its passage with an amendment to the effect that the judge of a court to whom application might be made for a change of venue in accordance with the provisions of the bill, should have the power to grant or refuse the order in his discretion. In this shape it passed the Senate unanimously, but the House refused to concur in the Senate's amendment, not knowing what influences might possibly defeat the merciful intent of the bill in my case in San Francisco. Accordingly it went back to the Senate, which body receded from their amendment, and on the ninth day of March, the bill having unanimously passed both houses, as originally recommended by the Judiciary Committee of the Assembly, it received the signature of the Governor and became a law.

As may be supposed, this simple act of justice enraged my enemies at San Francisco not a little. Anything that savored so much of mercy to me, necessarily gave mortal offence to that portion of the press which had been so industriously instigating my fellow citizens to hunt me for my blood for the past ten months.* Their howlings annoyed me, however, but little; and so soon as my counsel could obtain a copy of the law, the proper affidavits were filed in the Fourth District Court at San Francisco, and Judge Hagar, who occupied that Bench, made the order for the change of venue, making Napa County the place of trial.

Having now secured the certainty of an impartial trial, I patiently awaited the bench warrant of the Hon. E. W. McKinstry, Judge of the Seventh Judicial District, to which my case had been transferred. I kept very quiet, being visited by my friends, and occasionally amusing myself by listening to the debates at the capitol. In this connection I cannot but relate an incident which, while it sets forth in its true colors the inexpressible meanness which characterized the impotent rage of the poor wretch who edits the San Francisco Bulletin, at the same time shows the bold and manly scorn in which his littleness was held by a gentleman occupying the second highest position in the State Government.

I went one day by invitation into the Assembly Hall, and was seated within the bar, at the table of the member who had invited me, when the reporter of the Bulletin espied me. I had not been there five minutes before a despatch was telegraphed to that paper, stating the fact of my being there, together with the name of the member who had invited me. In that evening's issue of the Bulletin a scurrilous article appeared, commenting not only on me, but very severely on the gentleman who had taken the liberty of introducing me within the bar. It was, of course, a source of no annovance to my friend, who had often shown in his legislative course how little he heeded shots coming from that quarter, nor should I probably have remembered it now, but for the fact that the Hon. R. M. Anderson, Lieutenant-Governor of the State, and President of the Senate, on reading the article the next day, tendered me a standing invitation to enter within the bar of the Senate Chamber whenever I felt disposed, adding at the same time that "such pitiful persecution could never fail, among decent men, to make for the victim of it friends even among strangers."

While awaiting the action of the Court at Napa, a gentleman whom I knew to be my friend, called on me and informed me that he had every reason to know that important testimony would be adduced against me on the trial, which had not been given, either before the coroner, who held the inquest on Mr King, or before the grand jury. I listened attentively to the gentleman, for I knew him to be my friend, and then told him that it was all a fabrication which had been told him, to induce him to persuade me, if possible, to leave the country. I may as well here state that I understood it all, and that this was no shot from the Vigilance Committee, but was a ruse of certain gentlemen nearer home, whose treatment of me had left them no cause of congratulation on my unexpected return from exile. I said nothing of this, however, to my friend, for I knew that he was actuated by the kindest of motives, and

* The editor of that delectable sheet, the Bulletin, supremely disgusted that a sense of right and decency should have induced those sworn to support the laws and Constitution, to differ with him in his insane fanaticism, published the following silly and bombastic threat:

Let them Beware the Future.—We understand from good authority that J. Martin Reese, one of the parties arrested at the time of the capture of Judge Terry, and who was released from the rooms of the Vigilance Committee on his parole of honor, (which he afterwards broke), was engaged some time since in collecting by subscription among the law and murder sympathizers a sufficient fund to carry the notorious McGowan to Sacramento. These factionists were actually deceived by Estill's pompous assertion that a reaction had taken place in the feelings of the people, and calculating on the great chances of the Young Men's Democratic Club succeeding in the election of their candidate to succeed Frank Tilford as Senator, thought it would be the most favorable opportunity to return with McGowan and produce a collision with the friends of reform. This crowd of lawless men seem determined, now that they find sympathizers in the Legislature, to force the Vigilance Committee to commit some overt act.

We tell these men frankly that the Vigilance Committee and their friends throughout the State, are alive to all their schemes, and will not foolishly or rashly be drawn into their meshes. But should they deem it essential for their own protection, or in vindication of law and justice, again to take the reins of government in their own hands, there will be no child's play, nor will San Francisco be alone in the general cleaning out that will most assuredly follows. Los Angeles is now engaged in the work. The mountains will soon follow.

simply told him that I had come many hundreds of miles to stand my trial, and meant to do so.

The interview had one good effect, however; it awakened me to vigilance as to the machinations of the Committee, who, it struck me for the first time, might be endeavoring to suborn witnesses to ensure my conviction; and, as the sequel will show, this suspicion was not entirely groundless, and the defeat of their schemes was, in a great degree, owing to my watchfulness.

For some time after my case had been certified to the Court of Napa, I waited in Sacramento, expecting every day, that the sheriff of that county would arrive, with a bench warrant, and take me into custody. During this period nothing of interest occurred to me, except that, from time to time, my presence in the city, unconfined within a jail, elicited a howl of baffled rage from the "mob organ" of San Francisco, which, to my great amusement, was invariably taken up and re-echoed in the feeble yelp of such poodles of the press as the Sacramento Age, and other twopenny sheets, which have sprung into an ephemeral existence under the benign influence of sedition, even as musquitoes are engendered by the exhalations from a pestilential swamp. Their bite is but a trifle, but their hum is an insufferable nuisance.

At length, on the 14th day of May (which happened to be the anniversary of the shooting of James King of Wm.) a bench warrant was sent from Napa to the Sheriff of Sacramento County, under which I was immediately arrested by one of the deputies of that officer, and remained in his custody at the "Magnolia" until Sunday, the 17th, when Mr. Charles Clark of Napa, who had been specially deputed by the sheriff of his county for that purpose, arrived in Sacramento, and on the same day I accompanied him by way of Benicia to Napa City.

On arriving at Napa City, though still in charge of the sheriff, I was permitted to put up at the Napa Hotel, and was at liberty to go about the streets of the town accompanied by an officer, until Tuesday, the 19th day of May, when I was arraigned before Judge McKinstry and plead "not guilty" to the indictment. I was then remanded to the county jail, where I remained until Friday, the 22d of May. To the credit of the citizens of Napa County be it said, I found myself the only occupant of the jail. I was permitted to go about the entire building and was under no other restraint than my confinement to the house. I was treated with kindness, and made very comfortable by Sheriff Stark and his deputy, William Towns, Esq. Mr. Charles Clark, who had been sent to Sacramento for me, also visited me frequently, and by many acts of kindness rendered my captivity less disagreeable than it would otherwise have been. To all of these gentleman I beg now to repeat my many thanks for their consideration and kindness. On Friday, the day fixed for my trial, I again appeared in court, and the prosecution was allowed a postponement of the case for another week.

Immediately upon the order of continuance, I was recommitted to the jail, where I remained until the next Friday, the 29th of May. This postponement of the case on motion of the prosecution, who had professed to be only waiting for a chance to try me for nearly a year, not only disappointed me, but many others who had journeyed to Napa for the purpose of witnessing the trial. However, it rather helped, than prejudiced my cause, and I passed my week in jail very comfortably, being visited by scores of friends. To John B. Milliken, Esq., J. M. Dudley of Wells Fargo & Co's Express, and Edward J. Gage, Esq., I am under many obligations for unremitting kindness and attention during my imprisonment. I also met here an old Philadelphia friend of the name of Frank Whitticar, one of the proprietors of a circus then at Napa, who offered me, if I needed it, the use of his purse. I beg him again to accept my thanks for his good feeling toward me. Indeed, with few exceptions, the entire population of Napa City and the surrounding country treated me with marked sympathy and kindness. Many persons rode to Napa on no other business than to gratify their curiosity to see me. From the wood cuts they had seen of me in the mob papers, and the stories they had read of me, they expected, doubtless, to behold at least a moral if not a physical monster.

The New York Lubricating Oil Co., the manufacturers among other things of Monogram oils, have just made announcement that George P. Moore who has been coast representative of the Monogram interests in the past will hereafter handle all of the company's extensive lines of oils and greases, including their noted marine lubricants, with which the big fleet made its famous trip around the Horn two years ago. Charles O. Major will be Moore's special assistant in handling the stationary and marine end of the business on this coast. The New York Lubricating Oil Co. invasion of this territory will add a new feature to the lubricating oil trade here.

The Pioneer Automobile Company is making great preparations for an active season in Wilcox trucks.

PURITY ESSENTIAL

In no other form of food is Purity so absolutely essential as in milk products. Richness is also necessary, as without richness, milk is of little value as a food. Purity and richness are the embodiment of Borden's Eagle Brand Condensed Milk. As a food for infants or for general household purposes it has no equal.

Auto Notes

One of the leading objections to the quiet easy running electric automobiles has been that touring was impractical in them, owing to the necessity of recharging and the absence of conveniently situated charging plants. It remained for Del Monte to pioneer the way, and make long distance trips in electrics a possibility. Manager Warner has just announced the completion of two electro charging plants, one at Hotel Del Monte and the other at Pebble Beach Lodge on the Seventeen Mile Drive. The new scenic boulevards about the Monterey peninsula offer the motorist over forty miles of the finest roads in the State with a maximum grade of less than three per cent. The recharging arrangements now completed will make this section particularly attractive to owners of electrics.

The Bay Cities Electric Company reports the sale of a four passenger Columbus Electric Victoria to Mr. Albert Frank of the well known firm of S. H. Frank & Co., leather merchants. The car is for the use of Mrs. Frank and the fact that she has already become an adept at driving after only one lesson is a tribute to the ease of operation and perfect control of this popular Electric. The Victoria body will be used during the summer in the country and will be replaced for use in the city during the coming fall and winter with a four passenger brougham body, which is interchangeable on the same chassis.

Tex Rickard, beside being a prize fight promoter, is an automobilist of unbounded enthusiasm. Throughout the length and breadth of Nevada and especially along the hard desert routes he and his sturdy Thomas car are well known.

Mr. W. E. Travis, president and general manager of the Taxicab Co. of California who has made several trips recently in different makes of automobiles, testing them out, has taken delivery of a six-cylinder, seventy horsepower Thomas Flyer. This type of car has proven more satisfactory to Mr. Travis than any other car he has used and he expects to do many thousands of miles of touring in this new car.

According to C. E. Dutcher, manager of the Commercial Truck department of the Pioneer Automobile Company, this summer is to bring a decided increase in the number of local firms using motor driven vehicles for transfer purposes.

Asa Candler Jr., one of the best known amateur drivers in this country and the owner of the celebrated Atlanta motordrome, has just paid the Lozier Briarcliff car a compliment in ordering one of these models for his own use.

A tire record which takes the first place in this year's reports of service, as kept by The Diamond Rubber Co., has been sent to the big tire concern by Allen R. Kennedy of San Jose. Mr. Kennedy says that in 37,000 miles of service obtained from one set of Diamond Tires on a 4,000 pound car he had no occasion to remove the tires from the wheels excepting to repair the valves of two inner tubes. This happened on two occasions. The tires are 36x4 front and 36x5 rear and are still in use.

A letter from J. M. Pemberton of Scott, Ark., has just been forwarded to H. E. Doty, Pacific Coast manager of the White Company. An extract reads as follows: "I bought from you in August, 1909, a model O-O White Steamer and I wish to express to you my unqualified approval of this car. It affords me pleasure to make the statement that from the date of purchase to the present time I have expended only $3.60 on repairs, part of which includes the mending of punctured tires, an accident that befalls every car."

E. D. McCoy, manager of the Chanslor and Lyon Motor Supply Company, has just received word of what approaches a record in long tire life. Ex-Mayor Geo. F. Hudson of Stockton has two Hartford tires on his Mitchell car which have been giving uninterrupted service since January 10,1908, and this in spite of the fact that Mr. Hudson is an enthusiastic tourist giving his machine much use.

The Russian army, following the example of other continental armies, is about to test the adaptability of the motor car in military maneuvers and has selected the Hupmobile for the purpose. The order for the car was placed with the Hupp factory in Detroit a few days ago by Boris Nirifowff of Schnectady, N. Y., acting as commissioner for the director of railway service in the Russian government.

S. G. Chapman is just unloading a shipment of Oakland "30" touring cars. The factory is just beginning to get enough of this model ahead to again open sales. Because of the unexpected demand at the outset of the season word went out to agents to refuse further orders for "Thirties."

In spite of the fact that the best of 1910 cars were endeavoring to break it the marvelous world's record of 1196 miles in 24 hours made by the Lozier last year was never in danger at the Brighton Beach Motordrome during the meet this year. In fact the best record made this year was 24 miles behind the performance of the Lozier which ran second to the winning car of the same make in 1909.

In daily use in Beauty Parlors. Sold by all Druggists. Murine Eye Remedy Co., Chicago.

C. R. Zacharias, Modesto agent for the Pioneer Automobile Company, is in town to take delivery of a Hudson which he will drive back home. Zacharias reports that the roads are now fine in the Modesto section and auto touring is rapidly reaching its height.

Mr. W. H. Thompson has just joined the selling force of the Standard Motor Car Company and will devote his time in demonstrating and selling the Ford and Velie cars for the local agents. Mr. Thompson is well known in the city and has had some experience in the automobile game.

J. W. Leavitt has just unloaded a carload of Overlands, including one of the new model inside drives. These inside drive cars since their introduction have proven immensely popular everywhere. The Overland make has many striking features worthy of commendation. The room inside the top is rather more spacious than many similar cars offer while the doors are arranged for greatest ease in entering or alighting from the carriage. In appearance the machine has an elegance particularly its own. The top can be removed, converting the car into the usual Overland roadster. The price is $1500.

Mr. George Hankins accompanied by a party of friends has left for his home in Alturas, driving his new Oakland "30" of which he had just taken delivery. While in town Mr. Hankins also bought an Oakland "30" for a friend. This car is now being shipped. Because of the hard grades that have to be negotiated in his section of the State, Mr. Hankins was looking particularly for hill climbing capabilities when selecting the machines.

S. G. Chapman continues to send out Hupmobiles on deliveries as soon as shipments can be unloaded and equipped. The following cars have gone out recently, all being Hupmobiles: two to Wallace Bros. of Stockton; one to W. J. Johnson of Martinez; Judge J. W. Stetson of Oakland; Ray Machine Company of Visalia; E. D. Hoffaker of San Mateo; E. R. Oppenheim of Sacramento and George Young of Modesto.

NOTICE OF FILING OF PETITION FOR PARTITION AND APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSIONER, AND OF TIME SET FOR HEARING OF SAID PETITION AND APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSIONER, AND ORDER FIXING TIME FOR HEARING SAID PETITION.

In the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

In the Matter of the Estate of DENIS B. MURPHY, Deceased.

Timothy J. Flynn and Kate I. Prendergast, devisees and heirs at law of the Estate of DENIS B. MURPHY, deceased, having filed in this Court their petition for the partition of the property of said estate and for the appointment of a commissioner or commissioners to make said partition and good cause appearing therefor,

It is hereby ordered that the hearing of said petition be set for Monday, the 13th day of June, 1910, at the hour of ten o'clock a. m., in said Superior Court, Department Nine thereof at the Grant Building, corner of Seventh and Market Streets, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, at which time and place all persons interested may appear and show cause why said petition should not be granted.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE WHY ORDER OF SALE OF REAL ESTATE SHOULD NOT BE MADE

In the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California—No. 5102, Dept. No. 10.

In the Matter of the Estate of ROSE DEELY, Deceased.

Erna Weinberger, a judgment creditor of and interested in the estate of ROSE DEELY, deceased, having filed her petition herein, duly verified, praying for an order of sale of all the real estate of said decedent for the purposes therein set forth,

It is therefore ordered by the said Court, that all persons interested in the estate of said deceased, appear before the said Superior Court on Tuesday, the 14th day of June, 1910, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon of said day, at the Courtroom of Department No. 10, Probate, of said Superior Court, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, to show cause why an order should not be granted authorizing and directing Laurence Deely, Administrator of the estate of ROSE DEELY, deceased, to sell so much of the real estate of the said deceased, ROSE DEELY, as shall be necessary,

And that a copy of this order be published at least once a week for four successive weeks in "Town Talk," a newspaper printed and published in said City and County. THOS. F. GRAHAM, Judge.

Dated, May 6th, 1910.

Endorsed: Filed May 6, 1910. H. I. Mulcrevy, Clerk. By H. G. Benedict, Deputy Clerk.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE WHY REAL ESTATE SHOULD NOT BE MADE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the County of Alameda.

In the Matter or the Estate of HANNAH S. CRANE, Deceased.

MARY N. HUSSEY having presented to the Judge of this Court her verified petition praying for an order of this Court to sell the real estate in said estate at public or private sale, and it appearing to the Judge of this Court from such petition that it is necessary and would be for the advantage, benefit and best interests of the estate and those interested therein to sell the said real estate for the purposes and reasons therein mentioned, and said petition having been filed in the Clerk's office of this County;

It is hereby ordered that all persons interested in the estate of said deceased appear before the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the County of Alameda, Department No. 4 thereof, on the 14th day of June, 1910, at ten o'clock a. m. of said day at the Courtroom of said Court, at the Courthouse in the City of Oakland, County of Alameda, State of California, to show cause why an order should not be granted to the said administratrix with the will annexed of the estate of said deceased to sell the said real estate at either public or private sale.

It is further ordered that a copy of this order be published at least once a week for a period of four successive weeks in "Town Talk," a newspaper of general circulation printed and published in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, the City and County in which said real property to be sold is situated.

Dated this 10th day of May, 1910. WM. S. WELLS, Judge.

SUMMONS TO ESTABLISH TITLE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 21,256, Department No. 8.

MARGARET G. LINER, and ROSE McKOWN, formerly ROSE LINER, Plaintiffs, vs.

All Persons Claiming any Interest in, or Lien Upon, the Real Property Herein Described, or any Part Thereof, Defendants.

The People of the State of California: To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, greeting.

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Margaret G. Liner and Rose McKown, formerly Rose Liner, plaintiffs, filed with the Clerk of the above entitled Court and City and County, within three months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

Commencing at a point on the Northerly line of Twentieth Street, distant thereon Fifty (50) feet Westerly from the Westerly line of Noe Street, running thence Westerly along the said Northerly line of Twentieth Street Twenty-five (25) feet; thence at right angles Northerly Ninety-eight (98) feet; thence at right angles Easterly Twenty-five (25) feet, and thence at right angles Southerly Ninety-eight (98) feet to the Northerly line of Twentieth Street and point of commencement. Being a portion of Mission Block No. 112.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiffs will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that the plaintiffs are the owners of said property in fee simple absolute; that their title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consist of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiffs recover their costs herein and have such other relief as may be meet in the premises.

Witness my hand and the seal of said Court this 29th day of April, A. D. 1910. H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.
(Seal) By M. P. BRUTON, Deputy Clerk.

MEMORANDUM

The first publication of this summons was made in "Town Talk" newspaper on the 7th day of May, A. D. 1910.

The following persons are said to claim an interest in, or lien upon, said property adverse to plaintiff: Name, City and County of San Francisco (a municipal corporation); address, San Francisco, Cal.

909 Pacific Building, San Francisco, Cal. 5-7-10

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 29,006.

ROSE P. BLOW, Plaintiff, vs.
CHARLES H. BLOW, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City of and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to Charles H. Blow, Defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant on the ground of defendant's wilful desertion of plaintiff continuously for more than one (1) year last past; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

Given under my hand and the seal of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 11th day of April, A. D. 1910. H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.

Letters

Recent Naval History

Any discussion of the famous—or infamous—Sampson-Schley controversy must be in the nature of an argument before a packed jury, for those who have taken interest enough in the affair to form an opinion have long since come to conclusions not to be disturbed by evidence. Though no one can blame Commodore Schley for requesting an inquiry in order to put an end to the unofficial criticisms and insinuations of which he was the victim, the main result of the effort to belittle one deserving officer in order to "hog" all the glory for another has been to block the way of promotion to all and to give publicity to the small jealousies and petty annoyances from which hitherto those unconnected with the service fondly flattered themselves the officers and bureaucracy were entirely free. Mr. James Parker, formerly a lieutenant commander in the navy and one of Rear Admiral Schley's counsel before the Board of Inquiry held seven years ago but which was virtually a court-martial, has published a volume entitled "Rear-Admirals Schley, Sampson and Cervera," in which he reviews at length the whole campaign of the Atlantic fleet during the war with Spain, beginning with the assembling of the battleships and auxiliaries and ending with the destruction of the Spanish fleet, as well as a resume of the proceedings before the Board. Though both a naval officer and a lawyer, Mr. Parker has written for the benefit of the man on the street. He has omitted technicalities of all kinds and has made no effort to display erudition at the expense of lucidity, and the result is that though the book contains nearly 350 pages, large octavo and the subject itself is not the latest sensation, there is not a paragraph which will permit itself to be slurred or disregarded. Virtually it is a special plea in favor of his client and life-long friend and goes to show that much of the criticism directed against Rear-Admiral Schley for not having done or omitted to do one thing or the other is in the nature of hindsight—what he should have done if he had been in possession of very different information than was available at the moment. Dry-land sailors who manoeuver fleets on the flat tops of mahogany office desks are confronted by different problems from those to be met by commanders at sea on real water, and, as Bernard Shaw says, "Those who can do; those who can't teach" and some other philosopher has added, "those who can do neither criticize." It is charitable to assume now that Rear-Admiral Sampson was in no condition to have been placed at the head of affairs and after reading Judge Parker's tempered, if not altogether unprejudiced review of events it becomes more than ever apparent that the forces of the United States were favored with phenomenal luck from beginning to end, for, between lack of information, lack of definite orders and division of authority, it was pure blind luck that gave the opportunity to take advantage of the unfitness of the enemy. The war, insignificant as it was, taught us a few lessons, not the least of which has been the advisability of not inaugurating another war amongst ourselves over a division of the intangible spoils. The trivial details and conflicting testimony intended to prove that the whole battle of Santiago could have been fought more effectively had one of the ships sailed a foot further in some direction other than what she did, and which took up so much time and discussion in the inquiry appears not to have affected the result a particle and surely it would have been a gracious concession to a gallant officer, had Rear-Admiral Schley been given credit for what he accomplished instead of criticism for what he did not, especially when his chief critic was never near enough to be even a spectator. In other days soldiers and sailors were presumed not to have wasted time in acquiring the piddling arts of clerkship, and it must greatly enhance the reputation of both generals and admirals that they neither carried on injudicious correspondence nor submitted to newspaper interviews in which their ill-considered comments and criticisms of rivals were sown broadcast to stir up further controversy. Judge Parker's volume is written in a style and spirit to make it of interest to any one not entirely devoted to gum chewing fiction, and any boy of from twelve years upward should prefer it to "Jack Harkaway," if he is given a chance to express preference. A Charming River Book

Let no reader turn aside from "Three Rivers: the Hudson, the Potomac, the James" under an impression that this is another of Charles Lamb's pet abominations, a book that is not a book. The title does not give any indication of the charm of its contents, nearly three hundred pages of rambling reminiscences of the author. General Joseph P. Farley, U. S. A., a native of the State of Maryland, an employe of the Coast Survey Commission while yet only a small boy, a member of the class of cadets prematurely graduated from West Point in 1851 and an officer in the army as were both his father and grandfather. As a boy General Farley knew the country about the Potomac and James rivers where he had numerous friends and relatives; later, while serving in the army during the Civil War he was stationed in the same vicinity, and again, within the past few years, after long absence in connection with military duty, again he has visited the same spots. As a cadet at West Point he learned to know the Hudson, especially about the military academy and he had the unusual advantage of being the son of a graduate who, with a natural turn for literary composition, had committed to writing various lengthy descriptions of his own impressions. Both General Farley and his father served as instructors in drawing at West Point so that the earlier impressions there are likewise supplemented by later observations. The descriptions are interspersed with bits of biography, anecdote, history and observation. There have been whole volumes concerning Whistler expanded from no greater amount of material than is contained in the few brief pages relating to art in the curriculum of the military academy and the description of the battle of Bull Run is more graphic than any other that I have had the fortune to read. Much of the matter embodied in "Three Rivers" having been reprinted from elsewhere, it is a pity that the text has not always been modified to meet requirements. Owing to exigencies of space and page sizes it has been impossible to reproduce all the illustrations which accompanied the original text and in consequence the reader is frequently directed to some picture which has been omitted. This is a trivial and insignificant fault to find with so excellent a volume, especially when there are ten illustrations in color, reproduced from water color sketches by the author. With Your Favorite Breakfast Food

"FORCE"

It was always good enough, but it's better than ever now. Get the "happy habit" by eating the food that's full of sunshine and strength. FORCE has all the muscle-making material in the whole wheat combined with barley-malt--- the "pre-digested energy" of the two great life-giving cereals.

"FORCE" is made of the best white wheat, steam-cooked, rolled into thin flakes, combined with the purest barley-malt and baked. Always "crisp" it before serving it by pouring into a pan and warming it in oven. Then serve in large dish with cream, piling the flakes in one side of the dish and pouring the cream in the other side, dipping the flakes as eaten.

An Inspiring Standard Bearer

The Hon. Hiram Johnson entertained a large audience in this city last week with many assurances of the holiness of his mission. We are told that he made a "profound impression" on his hearers "by the vehemence that attested the sincerity of his utterances"; also that the enthusiasm which he stirred up with his expletives and epithets is conclusive of an aroused public spirit from which we may confidently expect deadly execution on election day. We have no doubt about the "profound impression." Mr. Johnson is always deeply affecting whether in defense of a criminal or in abusing the lawyer on the other side. That his vehemence attests his sincerity, however, is hardly a truism. If we accept Cicero as an authority, the fact is that "orators are most vehement when they have the weakest cause, as men go on horseback when they cannot walk." As to what may be expected from the public spirit which yielded to the magnetism of Mr. Johnson's personality, this is a matter about which there must be uncertainty. Experience teaches that the enthusiasm of an audience in the presence of a spellbinder under forced draught is not an infallible test of the public mind. In political campaigns especially, sporadic and isolated cases of enthusiasm are misleading. In political campaigns every audience is imbued with the spirit of partisanship and eager to have its emotions tililated. Mr. Johnson himself, we venture to assert, is not unaware of the susceptibility of the people that congregate to hear him orate. The probability is that fresh in his recollection are the profound impressions which but recently in another campaign he scattered with a prodigal tongue while sowing storms of enthusiasm without reaping the desirable rainbow. Fresh also, it is reasonable to suppose, in the recollection of the public, is the success achieved by Mr. Johnson in simulating sincerity in the role of an unselfish patriot during a period of severe hallucinatory delirium when San Francisco was within a stone's throw of complete dementia. Now presuming as we do that there is no confusion in the public mind regarding Mr. Johnson we are not at all enthusiastic over his prospects. We believe that as a job-chasing patriot Hiram Johnson is impossible inasmuch as his future like a comet's tail glows behind him. For we suppose it to be generally known that the thrifty lawyer who now asks the public to believe that he has consecrated his talents to the redemption of the sacred pillars of government is the same shifty practitioner who was but recently regenerating San Francisco with one hand raised to heaven and the other delving in Mr. Rudolph Spreckels' capacious pocket. And assuming that nobody has any misconception regarding the identity of Mr. Johnson; assuming that everybody knows that this is the same Johnson who before the disclosure of the golden inspiration of his fire-eyed fury in the cause of morality used to call upon God to witness his tremendous self-sacrifice, what reason is there for believing that he is now about to conquest the hearts of the people? Is it to be supposed that the people have been wrought up to such blind fury that they can be persuaded to put the affairs of their State in the hands of a man they know to be nothing more than a howling, self-seeking mountebank? It may be true that the people like to be hoodwinked. But in our judgment they don't like to be hoodwinked twice in succession by the same artist and with the same shell and pea game. In our judgment it was a mistake for the Lincoln-Roosevelt League to select for a standard bearer the man who had the prodigious effrontery while intimately connected with the privately conducted district attorney's office to become the attorney for a bank wrecker and line his pockets with loot that was paid for the pull which he employed to obtain clemency for his client. If it be doubted that the selection of Mr. Johnson was a tactical blunder, certainly it cannot be denied that it was condonation of indecency. Nor is it stating the case with too much violence of language to say that however eager the people of this State may be to express their rage against machine politics it is an insult to their intelligence to expect it to be done through the medium of a Hiram Johnson.

The Troubles of Los Angeles

It is perhaps well for us that experiments are now being made in new fangled governmental devices. For we are almost on the point of abandoning the fundamentals of our national government at the instigation of those quack statesmen who are working overtime in the populistic laboratory, compounding political panaceas and economic catholicons. Perhaps we shall not be able to appreciate the old formulas until we have practical demonstration of the inefficacy of the new. We have yet to apprehend the folly of pulling down an edifice which has answered our common purposes in a tolerable degree with the expectation of building again without plans and specifications of approved utility. We have yet to learn that perfection of theory is not perfection of practice; that between the two there is a gulf which few can bridge. But thanks to Oklahoma, Los Angeles and other places instinct with Populism and New Thought experiment is shedding light on matters of the utmost importance to all the people. Los Angeles is perhaps one of the best examples in the country of the danger of wandering from the safe and limited routine of ordinary practice and indulging in large and general innovations in government. Los Angeles presents a fine object lesson in the folly of approximating pure democracy. And yet the people of Los Angeles consider themselves far above the average in intelligence. Los Angeles is a city that justly boasts of its progressiveness, its goodness and its culture. In Los Angeles Virtue is invariably rewarded and Nemesis eternally pursues the wrongdoer. In Los Angeles it has long been customary to be shocked at the utter depravity and licentiousness of government in San Francisco. But now Los Angeles has troubles of her own. If we look on the two pictures presented by Los Angeles and San Francisco we may be inclined to the opinion that it is worse to be governed by reformers than by practical politicians. Los Angeles is governed by speculative philosophers from the Middle West and sociologists from everywhere. When they are not preoccupied with the question as to whether the soul is round or oblong they are engaged in supplying inspiration and the sinews of war for the Lincoln-Roosevelt League and kindred societies. And the government which these gentlemen have given Los Angeles seems to be proof of the inability of idealists to grapple with the realities of life. They have given Los Angeles among other things the Recall, the Initiative and the Referendum; and now the people find that these strange devices have some of the proclivities of the boomerang and the buzz-saw. The remarkable discovery has been made in Los Angeles that the devices which in theory were supposed to have been adapted by Providence to the crying needs of an oppressed people are in practice the handy instruments of greedy and incorrigible public service corporations. The people of Los Angeles have been bludgeoned with their own deadly weapons. Pathetic is the plight of Los Angeles. Groaning under a heavy bonded debt, the people haven't money enough to finish their great aqueduct, and they find that the reformers have tied them up in a knot while the public service corporations are threatening to strangle them with the referendum. In short the municipal affairs of Los Angeles are in such an awful tangle that even the practical politicians are pitying the reformers.

That Hetch-Hetchy Victory

The more we learn of the great and wonderful victory achieved in Washington recently by the Hon. Percy Long and the Hon. Marsdon Manson the greater becomes our amazement at the performance. Meagre were the details with which the taxpayers of this city were regaled when their distinguished representatives sent the glad tidings of triumph over the wire. All that we were permitted to know was that Secretary Ballinger had agreed to postpone the withdrawal of the permit to draw a water supply from the Hetch-Hetchy Valley pending investigation. It was made to appear that action had been suspended to give the city authorities time in which to prepare data in support of the proposition that the Hetch-Hetchy Valley is essential to our purposes. Now we learn that the action taken at Washington was somewhat at variance with the version of Manson and Long. The fact is that the Interior Department is not to be guided or influenced by the Manson and Long brand of expert knowledge. The required data is to be gathered by a board of army engineers. These experts are not to confine their investigation to Lake Eleanor or Hetch-Hetchy. They are to examine all available sources including those of the Spring Valley Water Works. Now with this investigation in prospect the probability is that the stockholders of the octopus have as much reason to rejoice as the taxpayers of the city. For it is almost certain that the engineers will find that the Spring Valley system is in need of but little augmentation. They will certainly find that the Spring Valley sources combined with Lake Eleanor will be sufficient for all our purposes for at least one hundred years. So, it is probable that upon thinking the matter over, the newspapers that were elated over the Manson and Long victory will experience an abatement of their enthusiasm. An official report by competent engineers is bound to illumine a situation that has long been systematically darkened by the corporation-baiters of politics and the press. After all, therefore, we may be justified in felicitating ourselves on the victory won at Washington despite the fact that it was preceded by the humilation of our distinguished representatives, who had to confess that though nine years have passed since the first filings were made upon the Hetch-Hetchy site no real attempt had been made to ascertain whether the valley was needed.

Wigmore's New Wrinkle

Professor Wigmore recently published a "Pocket Code of Evidence" which has evoked many satirical comments from members of the legal profession. In this book Professor Wigmore discusses the advantage of employing psychological experts to test the capacity of a witness. He says that psychological experts may be employed for that purpose, but that the admissibility of experiments by such experts depends upon conditions that may or may not exist in the uncertain future. In a note he adds, "This is not yet the law anywhere, but should be provided for in case applied phychology develops any such trustworthy method." How a judge is to determine when a standard method recognized as trustworthy has been discovered, Professor Wigmore does not say. He merely concerns himself with the question of the advisability of rendering it possible to test the accuracy of a witness's testimony. He believes that the time is coming when the testimony of a witness regarding the color of a suit of clothes or the date of his child's birth, or the number of his house will be challenged not by testimony in rebuttal but by psychological experts who will swear that he is not competent to give accurate information on such subjects. In this connection it is but just to state that it might be profitable to subject Professor Wigmore himself to psychological study. This is the same Professor Wigmore who questioned the soundness of the law in the Schmitz decision thereby winning the high encomiums of some of our purest patriots. The psychology of the professor's performance has never been clearly explained. But we know without psychological experiments that the professor never read the decision which he disapproved.

Bigotry in England

Much heat has been engendered in England by the proposal to amend the language of what is known as the "King's Declaration of Faith." The proponents of the amendment argue that it is unnecessary to perpetuate in the Declaration language that is insulting to the King's Roman Catholic subjects. But the London Council of the United Protestant Societies, with Lord Kinnaird in the chair, has protested against "weakening the existing safeguards of our Protestantism." The protest goes on to say "the practice of the Roman Catholic Church in anathematizing, and, where she is sufficiently powerful, of putting to death all who differ from her distinctive tenets invalidates the claim of the Roman Catholics to have the language of the Declaration altered or modified." From this it is evident that even in enlightened England there are people who still believe that the burning of bigots is one of the twentieth century pastimes of the Pope. But it should be explained that this delusion is not prevalent among members of the Established Church. Singularly enough, though it is the Established Church that is most interested in the Declaration, many distinguished members of that church are in favor of eliminating the objectionable language. The protestants are chiefly representatives of the sects whose traditions are written in the blood of heretics. The London Saturday Review which is devoted to the preservation of all the constitutional safeguards of the hereditary principle, and which holds that so long as there is an Established Church the King should be its head, discusses the issue with its accustomed calmness and clarity of vision. Taking up the argument involved in the protest of the United Protestant Societies the Saturday Review observes that three or four centuries ago a man who differed in religious opinion from the Government under which he lived, whether in Geneva or Spain, did so at his peril. Continuing the writer points out that the argument of the United Protestant Societies is to the effect that because the Roman Catholic Church has shown, or, if they prefer it, still shows a persecuting spirit, therefore it is right for the King at his Coronation to insult the religious beliefs of his Roman Catholic subjects. "In other words," says the Saturday Review writer, "the adjectives of the Declaration are a fitting punishment for the Roman Curia"; and observing, "This is the true spirit of persecution," he puts the case thus: " 'Here are men,' says the United Protestants, 'who hold opinions with which we disagree and which we regard as pernicious and even dangerous. We will not, therefore, try to convert them, an undertaking which requires wide knowledge, deep sympathy and unwearied effort. But we will instead punish them for holding their opinions—a proceeding, indeed, which will do no one any particular good, but will be a great relief to our Protestant feelings.' " In the judgment of the Saturday Review the United Protestants do not represent British Protestantism. On the contrary it is believed they are a small band of fanatics who have acquired an extravagant influence on party wirepullers by promising their support to any man, whatever his political or personal character may be, who will pledge himself to forward their policy of religious persecution. This is a description that nicely fits a certain breed of moralists in this country by which we are constantly threatened with legislation designed to make us live the ascetic life.

Repentance

When I look back along the travelled road,
The dusty pathway watered by my tears,
And feel the burden of my vanished years
Crushing me down beneath its heavy load;
While passion and desire for ever goad
Me, stumbling onward, and no angel hears
My prayer for light, such as, in by-gone years
God in the wilderness to Israel showed:

Then is my heart stung by a bitter pain
For thoughts of dear things lost beyond recall;
For hours of sunshine wasted, and the rain
Endured impatiently from spring to fall;
For days of hope deferred, and chances missed—
For starlike eyes unheeded, lips unkissed.

It is by no means certain that Colonel Roosevelt will run again. Next time he may turn the job over to Kermit.

The Democracy of California has indeed fallen upon evil days: Bell for Governor, Phelan beyond reach of the Finance Committee, and Flannery out of the running.

The people of Alaska import coal from Australia at $12 a ton because they cannot develop the coal fields at their doors. Thus is Conservation taking care of posterity.

The Link-Roosters, as General Otis calls them, are disingenuous. They hate to admit that the principle for which they are fighting is in the State Treasury and accessible only to job-holders.

Ned McGowan's Narrative

(We have now arrived at the last chapter of this remarkable autobiographic account of the adventures of a fugitive from the vengeance of the Vigilance Committee. McGowan thought it wise to include in his book a summary of the proceedings at his trial that everybody might learn how little justification there was for the hostility of the Vigilantes. This summary is here reproduced—Editor's Note.)

(Eleventh Instalment)

James W. Stillman called and sworn—Reside in San Francisco; was at the Bank Exchange on the 14th of May, 1856, about five o'clock p. m.; didn't see the act of shooting; heard the report; was in the street at the time; first came out at the door to go to dinner; not five minutes from five o'clock, immediately after the report, I turned; was standing with my back to the direction in which the pistol was fired; Mr. King passed me just before I heard the report, going in the direction of the Express office; spoke to me as he passed; heard the report; then I saw both King and Casey; Mr. Casey was in the act of stooping to pick up his cloak, or talma; King was in the act of walking towards the Express office; ran and took hold of him and asked him if he was hurt; he replied, "Yes"; assisted him to the Express office, to the back part; he groaned when mounting the steps; the clerks got a mattress to lay him down on, and I then commenced unbuttoning his clothes, to see where he was hurt; unbuttoned his coat, took a pistol from his pocket and handed it to a gentleman standing by; I then unbuttoned his shirt collar, until I found the wound; told him the wound was not mortal; don't profess to be a medical man; doctors came in and examined the case; don't know what became of Casey; told King I did not know where Casey was; the crowd had broken the windows, and they were talking outside so that we could hear them; had not seen Casey for two or three hours before; then saw him on Montgomery street; I was talking with Mayor Webb and Horace Hawes; think they were the men; it was about half-past two o'clock; I am entirely ignorant of anything else connected with the case.

Cross examination—Found a pistol on Mr. King; on the right side, I think; it was not in a pocket, but laying loose; it was a small revolver; didn't notice whether it was cocked or not; told Mr. King not to be frightened; he appeared very much alarmed at the time I spoke to him; know Mr. McGowan; did not see him there.

Dr. Toland called and sworn—Reside in San Francisco; am a graduate in medicine; about ten o'clock, on May 16th (evening) saw several messages for me, requesting me to visit Mr. King at the Express Building; when arrived, found Mr. King lying on the counter on a mattress; I did not examine the wound; saw the anterior wound, as it was exposed; I suppose twenty physicians were in the room; there were two openings; lying on his back; the posterior wound was concealed; Dr. Hammond had charge of the case—King's family physician; Mr. King's extremities were cold; vomited everything taken; very little pulse in the right arm and none in the left; physicians were administering stimulants for the purpose of trying to bring on a reaction; applying mustard plasters, etc.; I remained about two hours, finding physicians enough there, and not regarding him as my patient; I left about ten o'clock; before leaving, was requested by Dr. Hammond to return at seven o'clock the next morning; I then found Drs. Hammond, Bertody and Gray in council; reaction being partly established, we determined to have him removed to Montgomery Block; this was at seven o'clock in the morning; we met at five o'clock in the afternoon, and examined his wounds more particularly than we had before; the anterior wound was about an inch below the collar-bone—apparently over the first rib; the ball passed backward and rather inward, and escaped on the inner side near the upper extremity of the shoulder-blade; the arm was entirely paralyzed; motion and sensation destroyed; very cold, and somewhat swollen, and very slight pulsation in the artery could be distinguished; (this was in the afternoon of the 17th of May); he was still vomiting; right pulse though more full than in the morning, was still soft and impressible; not stronger than in the morning; believing that the vein in consequence of profuse hemorrhage; (can't assert hemorrhage); infer he lost a great deal of blood from the length of time it took to procure reaction—having laid twelve hours almost pulseless; we concluded to allow a small sponge introduced to remain, for fear of a return of the bleeding if it was withdrawn; he lay on his back; posterior wound large, and there was a constant discharge of bloody serum escaped, which prevented any accumulation within the wound; posterior wound much larger than anterior; believing that the artery in consequence of indistinct pulse at the wrist, although it might not be wounded, was so much injured that it might slough or yield to the pressure of the blood above, a compress wet with the cold water applied over the anterior, and a tourniquet arranged; all necessary was to turn a key. On the third day found him much more unwell than on the previous afternoon; I suggested the propriety (for the purpose of satisfying the public) that some other physicians be called; Drury Myron attended next consultation; next morning met to remove the sponge; Dr. Griffith opposed the removing the sponge; fourth day opening entire armpit to allow concealed matter to escape, but none was found; portion of lint passed in to keep the incision open; fifth day in the morning, still more unwell, pulse more rapid, expression of his countenance more anxious; I administered chloroform immediately and cautiously; object to lessen the sensibility of the wound; didn't think it necessary to bring him wholly under the influence of ether; this was about twelve o'clock, fifth day; all the physicians agreed to the action; no discharge took place from the wound, except a small amount of coagulated blood; his symptoms became gradually more unfavorable; though he had been getting worse from the fourth day; on the sixth he died, late in the afternoon.

Orlando C. Osborn—Was in San Francisco on the fourteenth of May, 1856; present at the time Casey shot King; heard report of pistol; saw Casey standing about seventy or eighty feet from him; saw him pick up a coat; had a pistol; it was a revolver; was advancing all the time and as I advanced saw Mr. King taken into the Express office; some persons came up to Casey and ushered him across the street in a diagonal direction; think some person then took the pistol; there was a person came up to Casey and took hold of his arm; they were going up Washington street; saw Casey raise his arm and drop a pistol in the hands or pocket of a person on his left; saw the pistol pass; it was a small sized pistol; about ten feet off was a yellow mounted pistol; positive of that; never saw it afterwards, or knew anything of its whereabouts; looked like a Derringer; didn't look like a revolver.

Cross examination—Casey was about seventy feet from the corner of Burgoyne's Building; then he dropped the pocket-pistol; taken from his left hand; I was advancing towards Casey at that moment, and was on the pavement right behind him; south side of Washington street; couldn't describe the pistol particularly; the guard was yellow; I know that; saw butt-end and mounting of the pistol, and that was yellow; did not see the

A Great Opportunity Missed

Being an Expression of Regret that Joseph L. King Overlooked so Many Romantic Possibilities in Writing His "History of the San Francisco Stock and Exchange Board"

By Edward F. O'Day

Since Honore de Balzac created the romance of money by making Mammon the composite hero and villain of his Comedie Humaine there has never been an episode in the epic of finance so full of dramatic intensity as the heyday of the San Francisco Stock Exchange. The names of the chief figures in that stirring adventure—Flood, Mackay, Fair, O'Brien, Ralston, Sharon, Jim Keene, "Lucky" Baldwin—are compact of romance; while the stocks themselves—Con. Virginia, Ophir, Hale and Norcross, Best and Belcher, Crown Point, Chollar and Potosi—conjure visions of golden opportunities seized or lost, of fortunes accumulated and dissipated overnight, of oriental extravagance and pinching penury, of lusty life and bitter death.

The story in its entirety has never been told, but all of us know parts of it. Whether we are of that rapidly diminishing number who rubbed elbows with the heroes of that epoch, whether we have inherited its traditions from our fathers or have simply acquired them with our residence in San Francisco, we are all aware of the tremendous events of that halcyon time. And taking up a book that bears the title "History of the San Francisco Stock and Exchange Board," noting that its author is Joseph L. King who has been connected with the Exchange for many years and who, it might have been supposed, inherited the literary tradition from James King of William, his father, it is natural that we should entertain lively anticipations of a romantic treat. It was in this spirit that I opened Mr. King's book and I am sorry that I must record a disappointment.

Mr. King writes as a business man, not as a litterateur. His style connotes the diarian jottings of a hurried trader rather than the leisurely narrative of an imaginative observer alive to the romantic wonder of the scenes in which he took a part. His book is fragmentary, ill-judged, lacking in unity and climax. As a source book it is valuable; as a history it is naught.

Possibly Mr. King intended only to put between covers a compilation of facts for the convenience of some future historian. Indeed he lays stress on the fact that the records of the Exchange were destroyed in the great fire and that the events of which he tells would possibly be lost to posterity unless collected in book form. But a collection of facts does not make history any more than a pile of twigs makes a fagot, and Mr. King has called his book a history. The misnomer involves a misconception which cannot but dash the enthusiasm of the reader.

In the annals of the Stock Exchange the year 1875 stands out as a twelvemonth of tremendous import. In that year occurred the immense rise in Con. Virginia and California with the sympathetic lift in other stocks. In that year the value of a seat in the Stock Exchange was $43,000. In that year fire swept Virginia City and caused a tremendous break in prices. In that year the Bank of California suspended and W. C. Ralston died. And in that year families that had been wealthy were so crippled by losses on the stock exchange that even today their descendants have reason to curse the gambling fever of 1875.

Here was a year to quicken the blood of the historian and to send his pen racing through vivid pages. But Mr. King has not been inspired. He does not rise to the occasion. His narrative is leaden; his chapters are skeletons to which the reader must put flesh and blood or miss the meaning of a California epoch. Some day the historian will breathe the breath of life into the lifeless clay of Mr. King's record and the world will have a great book. It will not be altogether a pleasant book to read because the historian will show both sides of the shield. Mr. King seems to know the golden side only; the tragedies of Pauper Alley find no mention in his pages. In fact Pauper Alley—was ever thoroughfare given a more sinister name?—is mentioned quite casually. As though it were not necessary, in the history of the Stock Exchange, to tell of the failures as well as of the successes!

Mr. King is best in his anecdotage. Scattered through his volume are some capital stories but they are mingled with a deal of rubbish unworthy of record. An anecdote of James C. Flood and Robert Sherwood favorably illustrates his manner of telling a story.

"In early days, in the '70s, quite a number of operators would gather together in Cahill's office on Montgomery street, near California. Among them were Mr. James C. Flood and Mr. Robert Sherwood. Sherwood had 1000 Consolidated Virginia, the stock selling at about $100. One day Sherwood, on looking at the prices, remarked that he was getting tired of that Consolidated Virginia; it did not move much. Mr. Flood said: 'What are you growling about? If you are tired of that stock I will take it off yours hands at $100.' 'Sold,' said Sherwood, and the stock changed hands.

"In course of time the Nevada Bank Building was erected on the corner of Pine and Montgomery streets. On meeting Sherwood one day, Mr. Flood remarked: 'We built that Nevada Block on the profits of that 1000 shares of Consolidated Virginia you sold us.'

"Subsequently, in the Sierra Nevada and Union deal, Mr. Flood approached Sherwood on the street and bought from him 5000 Union at $200 a share, the transaction footing up $1,000,000.

"Sherwood built the Union Block, on the gore corner of Pine, Davis and Market streets. Meeting Flood one day, he remarked, 'I built that Union Block with the profits on that 5000 Union I sold you.'"

It is too bad that praise cannot be lavished on Mr. King's book. It is a painstaking performance, undoubtedly possessing a greater degree of accuracy than was to be expected in the narration of events of which no official record remains. It is probable that no other member of the Exchange could have done the research work involved so intelligently and so scrupulously. For these merits the book must be commended and must be preserved in all our California libraries. Let us hope that some day in the not too distant future a writer with the gift for historical composition will find inspiration in its pages, even as Carlyle found in the dryasdust chronicle of a medieval monk the stuff from which he wrought his entrancing "Past and Present." I am sure that when this happens Mr. King will receive adequate acknowledgment for his industry in collecting and perpetuating invaluable material.

The Big Fight

The immature students of human nature among us who profess surprise at the tremendous amount of attention which the approaching fight between Jeffries and Johnson has attracted, would understand the real situation much better if they paid a visit to Rowardennan. Rowardennan, as all the world "and the rest of mankind" is aware, has flashed out of comparative obscurity as the training camp of the great white pugilist. Having been down at Rowardennan recently I may be open to the charge of enthusiasm, but some small experience with fights and fighters has taken away a great deal of the thrill which used to come when I inspected a pugilist or watched him perform. For a good many years now I have been checking up the before and after statements of would-be champions and I am not taken off my feet by glowing accounts of condition or perfervid statements of prowess. I went down to Rowardennan without overmuch enthusiasm and I returned wonderfully impressed. I was not merely impressed with the condition of the main attraction at Rowardnennan. To my mind that was but a small part of the story. Particularly was I impressed with the spirit which pervades the camp and it was to this spirit that I referred when I spoke of the understanding which would come to the anti-pugilistic reformers if they paid a visit to the beautiful resort at Ben Lomond.

The Secret of the Spell

It is no exaggeration to say that all over the world men are waiting with eager interest for the fight between the white and the colored boxer. Newspapers in every country are devoting columns daily to the subject. Sports are coming from all lands to see the fray. At the present time there are thousands in this city who will leave immediately after the fight. A list of the sporting writers, artists and photographers who have arrived from all parts of the country as well as from overseas, would fill a great deal of space—and they have not all arrived yet. Naturally all this interest focusses at Rowardennan and it is at Rowardennan, if anywhere, that we are to look for the clue to the phenomenon, so puzzling to many of our righteous citizens, of men of brains prostrating themselves in admiration before a man of brawn. And at Rowardennan the phenomenon takes on an aspect of extreme simplicity, the puzzle seems to solve itself. Unfortunately the secret of the tremendous spell which holds so many men at the present time is not new or startling; it is something as old as the world, something so old that we city fags usually overlook it in the mad rush from breakfast to business and from business to cocktails and dinner. The yearning for physical perfection explains why so many people are interested in the coming fight. Their interest in Johnson and Jeffries springs from the most important attribute of these two men—their physical vigor. It is the universal admiration for physical vigor that is focussed at Rowardennan.

The Women Are Interested

It is folly to pretend that women are not taking a deep interest in the Jeffries-Johnson fight. It is equal folly to assert that such an interest is unfeminine, something of which a womanly woman would blush to be guilty. We have only to watch the women reading the newspapers to realize how strong is their interest in this fight. But to stop at Rowardennan is to receive new light on this phase of the matter. Rowardennan is a general resort, so naturally there are women stopping there as well as men. Other women are constantly staying there for a short time as members of automobile parties. Last Sunday when I was at Rowardennan there must have been two hundred women there and every last one of them was more interested in the opportunity to see Jeffries box than in anything else.At the ring under the trees I spoke with women of culture who discussed Jeffries' condition as intelligently and as eagerly as any sporting writer. Some of these women could have discussed Dante or Ibsen, Maude Adams' Rosalind or Mrs. Atherton's latest novel just as intelligently and just as eagerly, if any of these subjects had been introduced. But I am sure that in their surroundings they would much prefer to talk about Jeffries and I am not going to carp at them either.

It's a Health Resort

Rowardennan, at the present time, is a great health resort and Jeffries is its inspiration. All of Jeffries' camp followers are more interested in keeping in the pink of condition than in anything else. That is what they are for. But the same spirit has been communicated to everybody in that mountain resort. Even newspapermen who had almost forgotten what exercise consisted of rise with the lark and do road work before breakfast. The conversation is all of walking and climbing, swimming and fishing, of showers and rub-downs. Everybody who looks at Jeffries immediately acquires an ambition—belated, absurd if you will—to get into condition and it is such a natural ambition that nobody laughs at anybody else. It did not seem ridiculous to see Willie Collier put on the boxing gloves with Jeffries last Sunday. The chances are that there is many a millionaire banker in town who would be tickled to death if Jeffries would let him spar a round or two. So really what Jeffries is doing is a great work. He is teaching the simple life—and leading it absolutely, from all that I hear. He is reminding us that our bodies are worth cultivating, a truism which we know by heart but very seldom use as a rule of conduct. Jeffries is one of the greatest men in the world today. He is at the head of his kind. Why not admit that? Why wonder that the world is watching him? It will be a poor sort of world when it outgrows the capacity to admire a giant like Jeffries.

The Race Feeling

What I have said of Jeffries applies likewise to Johnson, but in smaller measure. Johnson too is an example of superb physical cultivation. But Johnson is not a white man and it is too much to expect that any white man shall look on Johnson and admire him as he admires Jeffries. The race prejudice which flames in the South is practically unknown in California and yet there is a strong feeling against Johnson, based on his color. The primitive feeling of superiority insists on declaring itself. Sometimes it declares itself in disagreeable fashion. The crank is exercising his ingenuity over this fight as over every affair of human life. Not long ago a large package arrived at Rowardennan addressed to Jeffries. When it was opened it proved to be a miniature coffin enclosing the wooden effigy of a negro. It may be thought that Jeffries enjoyed this "joke" at the expense of his opponent but he did not. He was simply disgusted. A still more grewsome incident has not yet been called to Jeffries' attention. A few days ago a stranger walked into a newspaper office in this city and asked for the sporting editor. To the sporting editor he stated that he was a merchant of Memphis, Tennessee, and that he had come to San Francisco to see the fight. Producing a package he asked the sporting editor if he would have the kindness to convey it to Jeffries. Not knowing what sort of crank he had to deal with the sporting editor asked him to open the package. The Tennessean complied. It contained the scalp of a negro who was lynched in Memphis for the usual crime. "Please bring it to Mr. Jeffries," drawled the Tennessean, "with my compliments. But don't you think it would be a good idea to display it in your window, tied with a yellow ribbon, before you give it to him? That is merely a suggestion. But be sure you tell Mr. Jeffries that if he wears this scalp it will bring him good luck and there'll be another hanging at his belt on the fifth of July." The suggestion was ignored and neither the scalp nor the message was conveyed to Jeffries.

A Few Questions

That the newspapers are not publishing all the fight data that the public would like to read might be inferred from the following communication, were it not couched in a satirical vein:

San Francisco, June 11, 1910.

Editor, Town Talk.

Learned and Honorable Sir: I have recently evolved into what is known as a "fan" and am taking an interest in sporting events that I never took before. In fact I may say that I have "pugilitis" so keenly am I interested in everything pertaining to the roped arena. Naturally as my education along pugilistic lines was somewhat neglected in the past, I am not as well posted as I might and should be. Will you kindly then, in your enterprising journal, answer the following questions and so add to the knowledge not only of your humble inquisitor, but to that of the world at large?

1. Why don't the newspapers chronicle the daily deeds of the two great gladiators on the front page instead of hiding the news away in the sporting section?
2. Why don't the "war correspondents" at the two rival training camps give us more details about the world's greatest warriors?
3. Why don't the press photographers give us some pictures of Jeff's loving wife who is standing by him so loyally through all his financial troubles?
4. Is there a blow called the "Solar Perplexus"? If so, which hand delivers it? And when? And how often?
5. Is it true that Edmond Rostand, the author of "Chantecler" is at work on another rooster play for Mr. Jeffries?
6. What was the occupation of Jeff's great, great, great, great grandfather? Was he Lord Chief Justice of England?
7. If Jeff went to Rome would he "spar" with the Pope?
8. Does Jeff when he says his prayers, ask to be saved from the almshouse?
9. What city in Africa was Johnson's great, great, great grandfather mayor of?
10. What percentage of the gate receipts on July 4 will be donated to charity?
11. What effect upon civilization will the battle have?
12. Will the newspapers get 75 per cent of the gate receipts for advertising the fight months in advance?
13. Don't you think they should?
14. Will the fight "hurt business" in "P. H's Paris"?
15. Which gentleman is the negro, Jeffries, Johnson, Rickard or Gleason? This is to decide a bet.
16. Will there be anything worth reading in the newspapers after July 4, 1910?
17. Has it as yet been decided who will win the fight?
18. If I bet on the fight and lose what shall I tell my wife?

Hoping I have not tired you, Mr. Editor, and that you will soon give me and others the desired information, I remain,

Yours anxiously,
—An Ignorant Fan.

"Are you going to take your motor car out today?"

"I don't know," answered Mr. Chuggings, in a tone of slight embarrassment.

"If you do take it out, where will you go?"

"I can't say positively. I'm only the owner of the car, not the chauffeur."

He's a Good Mixer

Judge Wilbur of Los Angeles has been spreading his message among the unregenerate of Oakland. Judge Wilbur is the great bible champion who has been advising the people to elevate him to the Supreme Court that he might facilitate the reformation of the judiciary. At home the judge is a reformer, scornful of the practical politician and all his works and ways. Away from home he realizes that to advance the greater good which he symbolizes it is expedient to mingle with his fellow men and promote civic virtue by means of personal effluvia. As a consequence he is known in Oakland as a good mixer. His cicerone in Oakland was himself a good mixer, but not of the same brand as the purist from Los Angeles. A mixer of drinks it was that had the management of Judge Wilbur's itinerary in Oakland. From which circumstance it might be inferred that the Los Angeles jurist has no conscientious scruples against exploiting the saloon vote.

Hoyle of San Quentin

John E. Hoyle, warden of San Quentin, has accomplished some wonderful reforms in that penitentiary. When he took charge of affairs at San Quentin they were in a state of chaos. In no State in the Union was there a penitentiary so badly managed as the one across the bay in Marin County. Today there is none so well managed. Warden Hoyle has solved many problems in penology, proving not only that he has great executive ability but also that he is a man of fine impulses, as deeply concerned for the moral welfare of the unfortunates who come under his charge as for the interests of the State. The things that Warden Hoyle has done at San Quentin have caused him to be known among penologists and humanitarians far beyond the boundaries of California. But only recently have his achievements received recognition at home. People hereabouts are beginning to sit up and take notice of the man who transformed San Quentin into a model penitentiary. The other day the Call, which finds it difficult to conceive of good coming out of machine politics, took occasion to acclaim Warden Hoyle editorially, and, incidentally, to admit that "Not the least of Governor Gillett's services to California has been his selection of John E. Hoyle to be Warden at San Quentin."

The Santa Cruz Convention

No, indeed, the selection of John E. Hoyle is not the least of Governor Gillett's services to California. Governor Gillett has rendered so many services to California that his determination to retire to private life is regretted by a very large majority of the people of the State. The memory of the oldest inhabitant runneth not to the time when a governor of California approached the close of his term so firmly intrenched in the confidence of the people as Governor Gillett. Now this is something worthy of reflection in these piping times of insurgency that resound with the vociferations of reformers against the clamant evils of machine politics. Governor Gillett is a machine politician. Which means that he is not in sympathy with the self-righteous patriots whose greed of office is inspiring perfervid exhortations to the pee-pul to avail themselves of the opportunity to redress their wrongs. Scarcely a day passes on which we are not reminded of the infamous Santa Cruz Convention. What the infamy of it was is never clearly explained. But whatever it was we must certainly feel that it was somewhat mitigated by the circumstance that the deliberations of that convention resulted in the shelving of "Weak Brother" Pardee and the nomination of one James N. Gillett.

Herrin's Oregon Address

Mr. William F. Herrin, chief counsel for the Southern Pacific Company, delivered a notable address the other day at the jubilee celebration of the Oregon Agricultural College. It was notable for two reasons. One is that Mr. Herrin though a man very much in the public eye was never before in the public ear. The other reason is that the thoughts expressed and the manner and style of their expression were not of the commonplace. It is evident that Mr. Herrin is versed in the principles of the science of government as well as in the philosophy of his country's history. It is also evident that he is a man to whom words are living, breathing things, with color and character. To people hereabouts he is known chiefly as a great artist in practical politics, the reason being that he represents a corporation which pays one-eighth of the taxes of the State and which from that circumstance alone, if not from the motive of self-preservation, is perhaps as deeply interested in the government of the State as any private individual or group of private interests. But whatever be the popular conception of Mr. William F. Herrin, no intelligent man can read his address on the public duties and civic responsibilities of college graduates without realizing that he is a scholar with the ability to leave his impress deeply on the opinions of those among us who attempt to enlighten their practice by philosophical meditation. This being the case Mr. Herrin is justly to be taken to task for his protracted reticence. In his Oregon address he said among other things, "Never in the history of our country has there been greater need for intelligent public leadership than now." In this sentiment many of us will concur. And at the same time many of us will ask, Why doesn't Mr. William F. Herrin more frequently avail himself of opportunities to get into the public ear? The country is not bountifully supplied with men capable of leading public thought in the right direction. And few of those that have the capacity ever take the public into their confidence. They concede to the demagogue the right of way. One of the exceptions is James J. Hill, a man of great loquacity, who always commands attention. The late E. H. Harriman toward the close of his career emerged from his seclusion, and the moment he began talking to the people they preferred to give him their attention than to bestow it on his assailants. A few more talks, Mr. Herrin, and you will be surprised at the rapidity with which the public will lose interest in the mouthings and cant of your critics.

A Noisome Profession

The profession of muckraking is so beset with temptations that I am sorry to see it adopted by the brilliant young correspondent of the Stockton Mail. Possessed as he is of a conscience he cannot follow the profession without incurring mental anguish. It is hard for the muckraker to avoid doing mean things in order to win distinction in detraction. And in the practice of calumny he is bound to acquire a point of view from which he will be ever inclined whenever either of two inferences may be drawn to embrace the one that imputes to somebody a wrong motive. The muckraker is never so charitable as I will be in discussing what the Stockton Mail's correspondent has to say about the decision of the Court of Appeal reversing Judge Lawlor in the Emmons case. To this discussion I called attention two weeks ago, and what I had to say about the rebuking of Judge Lawlor inspired in the Mail's correspondent what he conceived to be a few happy thoughts. In the elaboration of them he adopted all the most vicious methods of the muckraker his purpose being to indicate that the Court of Appeal reversed Judge Lawlor for the purpose of justifying the position assumed by the defendants of the graft prosecution who did not take the witness stand. Now I do not wish to be understood as charging that the Mail's correspondent deliberately distorted, garbled or perverted the facts with which he dealt. The fact is I do not believe he could be hired to do anything so unjust. I am of the opinion that he has been misled, and I think that I can point my finger at the misleader. But let us scrutinize this characteristic specimen of muckraking.

The Deadly Parallel

According to the Mail's correspondent the evidence against Emmons was sufficient to convince any honest jury of his guilt. This is doubtless true. Next we are told that the Court of Appeal granted the defendant a new trial because Judge Lawlor refused to give a certain instruction to the jury. This instruction, he says, was as follows: "The mere fact that the defendant does not testify raises no presumption or prejudice against him." And he adds: "In effect it warned the jurors that they should banish entirely from their minds the fact that Emmons had not testified in his own behalf." Here we have what purports to be the instruction verbatim, but it is nothing of the kind. However this bit of garbling is of little moment. The whole point of the case was in the reading to the jury in lieu of the instruction denied Section 1323 of the Penal Code. Now for the deadly parallel:

Section 1323 of the Penal Code

A defendant in a criminal action or proceeding cannot be compelled to be a witness against himself; but if he offer himself as a witness he may be cross-examined by the counsel for the people as to all matter about which he was examined in chief. His neglect or refusal to be a witness cannot in any manner prejudice him nor be used against him on the trial or proceeding.

Section 1323 as Quoted in the Mail

A defendant cannot be compelled to be a witness against himself. His neglect or refusal cannot in any manner prejudice him or be used against him on the trial or proceeding.

Not a word in the Mail as to the right of the counsel for the people to cross-examine a defendant when he takes the witness stand. "Judge Lawlor," says the amiable muckraker, "merely cited the rule that a man cannot be made to convict himself." Of course Judge Lawlor did more than that. He read to the jury a section of the code that was never intended to be read as an instruction, and his obvious purpose was to intimate to the jury that the defendant did not take the witness stand because he was fearful of a cross-examination that might bring out the truth. The only thing that the jury should know, as Judge Lawlor must know if he has ever read any law outside of the codes, was whether the defendant had a right to hold his tongue, and whether the jury had the right to draw any inference from his holding it. Of course every lawyer and many laymen know that the defendant had the right to hold his tongue, but the Mail's correspondent, indulging the habit of muckrakers, infers that some new principle of law was expounded when Judge Lawlor was reversed and rebuked. "Now for the exposure of the colored gentleman in the Appellate Court's woodpile," he exclaims; "Ruef stood mute. Louis Glass stood mute. Pat Calhoun stood mute. Mike Coffey stood mute. Tirey Ford stood mute." Again: "There is virtue in standing mute, we may hear the Appellate Court say. Muteness implies a lofty contempt for the prosecution's case," et cetera. Rather far-fetched are these inferences in view of the fact that standing mute is one of the inalienable privileges of American citizens. It requires nothing in the nature of sanctification. Doubtless it often defeats the ends of justice, but there is nothing that so frequently defeats these ends as the perversity of trial judges who arrogate to themselves the right of ignoring the law whenever they see a chance of swelling their record for convictions. The case of Emmons is probably one in point. If Judge Lawlor had given the instruction asked for the jury in all probability would have found Emmons guilty. But Judge Lawlor wished to make it a cinch. And now perhaps when Emmons is tried again some of the witnesses will be missing. Admit as one may that the reversal is unfortunate, yet the Court of Appeal is not properly to be blamed for insisting that trial judges shall act as such and not as prosecutors.

Twain's Scatological Work

A Los Angeles correspondent who asks that his name be withheld has sent me the following communication concerning a work by Mark Twain printed for private circulation about which I wrote two or three paragraphs some time ago:

In your issue of May 21, 1910, "Spectator" writes of "A Rare Work by Mark Twain," thereby giving the first public hint I have seen on the Pacific Coast of the existence of the writing in question. It was a surprise to me to learn that a copy was to be found in this part of the world. As I have understood from people supposed to know, the inside history of this truly wonderful reconstruction of Elizabethan thought and colloquial speech, is that there were only one hundred copies printed, and that these were sent exclusively to such friends of the author as, in his judgment, would appreciate at its true literary value, his contribution to correct knowledge of the life, manners and morals of a great historical era, and would not misconstrue his motive and object in writing it. Although, as I have been informed, a large majority of the recipients were delighted, and hailed the sketch which was entitled "Fireside Talk in the Days of the Tudors," as a triumph of erudition and scholarship, there were a few who "viewed with alarm" what they claimed was calculated to "bring the blush of shame to the cheek of innocence"; the same kind of "innocence" exemplified some years agone by the Tennessee legislature when it ordered the nude figures of Thorwaldsen's Seasons on the terrace of the State capitol to be swathed in canvas.

The verdict of men of culture, learning and sense like the late John Hay, who held the work to be Mark Twain's masterpiece, did not save the author from a sense of mortification and disgust anent the attitude of utter misunderstanding and puritanical nose-lifting displayed by some of his formerly valued acquaintance in New England and the Middle West. Because of this an earnest effort was made to recall every copy extant and, until I saw the reference to the San Francisco example in "Town Talk," I supposed that it had been successful with one or two exceptions. I am not sure about the copy belonging to Secretary Hay, but I am about another which was among the most cherished possessions of Eugene Field who, just before his death, gave it to a friend as a present of rare value. At the outside I think it improbable that there are more than three or possibly four original copies in existence.

Access to the Field copy has made me familiar with the work which I have read a dozen times or more. That, however, was some years ago and now I can recall the text only in a fragmentary way although I remember the story as a whole quite vividly. The scene, as "Spectator" states, is laid in "an English castle," and in the "closet of the Queen's Most Excellent Majestie." In addition to the "talkers" mentioned in your note, i. e., "Elizabeth, Shakespeare, Sir Walter Raleigh, a couple of duchesses and a young noble woman"—the last named being "the little lady Helen, aged fifteen"—rare Ben Jonson and Francis Beaumont, aet. 16, were of the presence.

A Pungent Conversation

The company indulged in several subjects of conversation, all as distinctly Elizabethan in tone as the famous ruff of that name; but the principal topic, in the discussion of which the "full strength of the company" is in action, brings before the reader's vision the Bard of Avon, Ben Jonson and Beaumont speaking in language, and with methods, manners and metaphors so lifelike, characteristic and consistent with their best known work, that one has to stop roaring over the reductio ad absurdum, given in Mark Twain's richest vein of humour, to wonder at the magician whose wand has reincarnated for us these great ones, making them even as they must have appeared and sounded to the people of their own generation.

When Mark Twain was in England gathering material for his book, "The Prince and the Pauper," he spent a great deal of time in the British Museum and in the Bodleian library at Oxford, saturating himself with lore of the Tudor period. Placed at his disposal were thousands of original letters, diaries, monographs and what not written by men and women of the royalty, nobility and gentry of those days when the English educated classes were prolific of intimate and voluminous correspondence, journals and memoirs prepared for family perusal alone, and all such like things. Mixing and melting over these materials in the crucible of his genius, he was able to reconstruct the character, thoughts, motives, morals, faults, foibles, manners and speech of the sturdy, plain-spoken folk who lived and moved, fought, drank, diced, loved and gossipped in the reign of good Queen Bess, as no one else ever has been able to.

If any one be curious about the main topic of the "Fireside Talk," he may obtain more than an inkling of it in the pages of Isaac D'Israeli's "Curiosities of Literature," in which can be found a paragraph relating to an amusing Elizabethan court incident, no doubt the immediate historical inspiration of Mark Twain's esoteric production. D'Israeli tells us that a certain devoted and punctilious courtier, much liked by the "virgin queen," in making his obeisance on a time, accidentally violated one of the canons of etiquette as made and provided for public functions. The offence itself was nothing much or material. D'Israeli refers to it as merely "a trifle light as air"; but the culprit was so abashed and mortified that he rushed from the court and made for Italy as fast as horse and sail could carry him; and there he stayed for three long years. Finally, like the celebrated Lord Lovel, "languishing thoughts came into his head," and he started home, taking with him as a peace offering several pairs of woven silk stockings of Venetian manufacture theretofore unknown in England. After sending these by a safe hand to her majesty, the penitent ventured to present himself in person. He was most kindly received, Elizabeth graciously observing that she was glad to see him back, and expressing the hope that he had quite forgotten the occasion of his leaving, which, for her part, she had dismissed from her mind as soon after the occurrence as she had been able.

Josaphare on the Literary Centre

Notwithstanding his long hair, his soulful eyes and other accoutrements of the poetic temperament, Lionel Josaphare is not in ardent sympathy with the views of those of our literati who believe that the atmosphere which they generate in these parts warrants them in assuming that the world's literary centre is hereabouts. A true literary artist himself, yet Josaphare does not take himself seriously as may be learned from a letter which he recently wrote to the New York Sun apropos of the recent discussion therein of the fertility of literary genius in California. This is the letter:

To the Editor of the Sun—Sir: On May 21 The Sun printed an interview which gave credit to California's climate for the literary productiveness hereabout. This topic is a favorite with authors that have dwelt anywhere from Siskiyou to San Diego, Sierra to the sea. About a year ago some California writers contributed answers to the question, "Is California Destined to Become America's Literary Centre?" This question was propounded by the managers of the Carmel Whirl, a paper that was issued for one day to promote enthusiasm for a carnival. All the writers answered in the affirmative, with more or less sureness. All gave the credit to California's climate and scenery, modestly refraining from mention of their own genius as pertaining to the case. In discussing the influence of earth, air and water as apart from literary fire, one of the writers asserted that population might eventually be a considerable quantity in the equation; and he indicated the section of the State from which the pointed leg of the literary compass would describe the circle. Yet even this section was broad and vague.

Thus we can hardly tell whether it is modesty or egotism that prompts these views. Modesty might prevent the author from assuming the initial cause of power, egotism might affect him to look about for valid cause of superiority.

Now, had I been asked about America's literary centre I should have been more exact than the others, even at the sacrifice of such reticence as may be becoming but ought not to dim the truth. I should have given the home and the business address of the literary centre and told where it could be found in my summer vacation. Were I capable of aesthetics and psychics, indeed, I should enjoy being the literary centre of America; and when I should engage in a literary whirl there would be something centrifugally doing, forsooth, and no mistaking me for the centre of gravity walking in its sleep, and San Francisco editors would consider my books as important a piece of news as they esteem "Raisin Day."

Of course, if we had no climate or scenery we should have no poems or stories, yet too much climate and too few readers are not a stimulus to literature; and I should like to be informed why the atmosphere energizes the writers to write, but not the other part of the population to read. Also, why does the climate give one poet a better style than another?

I was born in a Southern State where we had landscapes here and there, climate all the year round, and geography as far as the eye could see. Flowing past our town was a little creek, called the Mississippi in those days. We had no literary centre in the neighborhood, no Athens of the Pacific, no California Stratford-on-Avon. Yet no one complained as the cornbread supplied enough inspiration to distinguish the full moon from a hole in the ground, an elemental distinction that is the beginning of all wisdom.

I wonder why this atmosphere does not arouse editors to notice literature more than they do. On seeing the name of a California author in the headlines we may feel sure that the author has died or is being sued for divorce, or is low with appendicitis.

Thus unappreciated, a number of writers have caused the transference of America's literary centre from San Francisco to Carmel-by-the-Sea. Climatically considered, Carmel is the logical site for the literary centre of America, though not yet the birthplace of any writer or the location of a publishing house. However, the literary centre of America might just as well remain there until removed to the precincts of a more enterprising real estate dealer.

Wilson Mizner's Latest Role

Wilson Mizner, most irrespressible member of an irrepressible family, is just now astonishing San Francisco in a novel role. It is neither more nor less than that of manager to a prize-fighter, the particular plugugly to whom he has articled himself being Stanley Ketchel. Ketchel once enjoyed the managerial offices of poor Willus Britt and under the tutelage of that greatest of all publicity agents, reached the high places of pugilistic prosperity. After Britt's death Ketchel induced Bert Igoe, the San Franciscan cartoonist, to leave the Hearst service in New York and to manage his affairs. But Igoe did not find the position congenial. He found that Ketchel expected him to take a lively part in all his diversions and for the diversions of a pugilist Igoe has no stomach. So the twain agreed to disagree and when Igoe sought to collect $1500 which was due him for his services he had the greatest difficulty in wringing it from the hard fist of the fighter. Looking about for a congenial manager Ketchel finally fixed on Wilson Mizner who lacks the scruples about pugilistic diversions which caused Ketchel to adjudge Igoe "no sport." While Mizner is thus engaged his former wife Mrs. Yerkes is contemplating another dash around the matrimonial cinder path in company with one Billy Lower. It is said in New York that the marriage will take place early in the fall.

"I can't see why men like to get up early and go fishing," says Mrs. Malaprop. "Now, my husband is a regular anglomaniac. I mean, he's a debauchee to the episcatory art. Fish? Why he's an apostle of old Izaak Newton himself!"

A Surfeit of Poets

South of Tehachapi there are poets a-plenty—poets galore and then some more. The atmosphere and tradition of Southern California is strongly conducive to poesy and poets are born there every day. Even the nomadic tourists who "stop over" in Los Angeles to visit Pasadena and Riverside and the beach cities contiguous to the southern metropolis are affected by the contagion and return to their homes riming "sun-bright strand of the sundown sea" with "moon-light land of the lemon tree." So plentiful are poets in the southland that the San Diego Chamber of Commerce has offered a prize of three dollars for the best poem to fit the lilting tune of the "Yama-yama Man." Three dollars is not a large prize for a good poem but it must not be forgotten that Milton received only twenty-five dollars for his epic of "Paradise Lost." The Chamber of Commerce of San Diego does not require its poet clientele to produce an epic; they merely request a lyric or a brief ode, not longer than Shelley's "Skylark" or Keats' "Eve of St. Agnes." And they do not insist that the quality of their prize poem shall excel either of these classics. No doubt a poem such as has been requistioned by the San Diego Chamber of Commerce would fetch a higher rate in northern California where real poetry is not yet a drug on the market except during the Memorial Day season and Fourth o' July, but it must be taken into consideration that in Southern California the poem supply greatly exceeds the demand. Consequently the tariff has been revised downward.

Commercial Value of Dead Poets

In a recent issue of the Los Angeles Times appeared a page of eulogy and biography concerning Eliza Otis who, in her lifetime was a Southern California poet of no mean ability after the manner and inspiration of Wordsworth. She was also the wife of the owner of the Times who combined sorrow with business in this instance by appending at the end of the Times panegyric an announcement that the dead poet's poems could be purchased at the office of the Times for $2.50 per cloth bound volume or $15 per edition de luxe. It was a tribute worthy of the genius of the departed as it was also a conspicuous example of the bereaved husband's thrift and keen sense of the commercial fitness of things. As a rule poets are not appreciated at their true money value in their lifetime. Oftentimes they sing for bread and are rewarded with a stone after they die of starvation. Why should it be deemed incongruous or unpoetical to advertise their poems on the stone? Besides, their heirs are certainly entitled to receive all the profit that may accrue from the postmortem appreciation of posterity.

Poetry and History

The most popular poet in Southern California is John S. McGroarty. Poet McGroarty's finest poems are in prose, but nobody who reads them stops to think of that. It is the afflatus rather than the form that makes poetry. Occasionally, however, Poet McGroarty slices his prose into metrical lengths and utilizes his license. He has done this in his poem entitled "The Golden Gate," beginning, "Green Tamalpais, starward swung, brown hill and harbor isle, O winding rivers, inland flung where sea-lured valleys smile." Rivers "inland flung" and valleys "sea-lured" are seeming contradictions of geographical verity, but we must not be too critical of the work of a full licensed poet. "I see you watch and wait," observes Poet McGroarty, "as when in quest of Monterey, swart old Don Gaspar and his men (like 'stout Cortez on a lone peak in Darien') looked on you first, that day; I see you watch in mist and sun, as when the Spaniard bore in from the sea, where galleon had never sailed before." The license here invoked by Poet McGroarty is historical rather than poetic. It is not historically accurate that "swart old Don Gaspar" was "in quest of Monterey." He was looking for a presidio site much farther north where Father Serra intended to establish a mission in memory of St. Francis. At the time "swart old Don Gaspar" was reconnoitering the coast of California there was no Monterey to be quested. As for the Golden Gate which Poet McGroarty says was "looked on" by Gaspar and his men, the truth of history compels us to insist that it was Commandante Fages who discovered the Golden Gate from the hills back of what is now Berkeley; and that Don Gaspar did not see the bay of San Francisco until he came north on his second expedition, with Father Serra. Moreover, the Spaniard could not bear "in from sea," "where galleon had never sailed before," because the "galleon" of Sir Francis Drake had sailed in that sea more than a century before. But why hold a poet to the historical verities? Canst chain the condor swooping amid Andean heights? Canst dam the tides of old ocean lashing the rocky bastions of Mendocino? What is history to McGroarty? or McGroarty to history? McGroarty's a poet—not a historian. Therefore go to, thou carping, cavilling critic, for poets are born and historians are only made—and both are liars anyway.

Scheffauer's Reply to a Critic

When Herman Scheffauer, the California poet and critic, recently called attention to a poem by Miss Ethel Talbot, a young English writer, which found its inspiration in a protest against the rather pessimistic mood of Miss Ina Coolbrith's "When the Grass Shall Cover Me," he excited the critical indignation of one of Miss Coolbrith's admirers. The letter in which this admirer, a Mr. Howe, declared that the comparsion of the two poems was a sacrilege I published last week. Now Mr. Scheffauer puts his pen in rest and runs tilt at Mr. Howe in the following fashion:

For one so evidently concerned with the fitness and exactness of words as Mr. I. Henry Howe, to use the drastic term "almost a sacrilege" in connection with Miss Ethel Talbot's fine verses written as a commentary on Miss Ina Coolbrith's famous poem, seems, I may say, almost an inconsistency—and an extreme one.

No one acquainted with the best and most significant work of the younger British poets would have fallen into the error of classifying the work of this true poet with that of "minor versifiers or newspaper verse writers," nor denied to her the attribute of a great, uncommon gift. The relative merit or demerit of the two poems was not the question at issue, for the comparison of poems or poets is a futile game, fit only for persons who nurse the baneful habit of decrying the rose for not being a lily. In this case of "When the Grass Shall Cover Me" and "Give Love Today" it was merely a matter of difference in sentiment and not in degree of poetic worth.

Miss Coolbrith is a dear friend of mine, and her work is the product of a rare genius which it has always delighted me to honor and extol. But none the less may it be said that Ethel Talbot indubitably occupies a premier place among the women poets of the new generation in England, and since Mr. Howe avows himself susceptible to the charm and glamour of real poetry, I promise him a distinct treat if he can bring himself to pay some passing attention to it. As for his remark that "There are not half a dozen real poets now writing in America"—that, I fear, reveals a lack of acquaintance with the poets of his own land almost as great as his unfamiliarity with those of present-day England.

To Keep Barrymore Single

In order to restrain Jack Barrymore from entangling himself in a matrimonial alliance which would lessen his drawing power as a star Cohan and Harris, the New York theatrical producers, have insured his bachelorhood for one year, Lloyds of London issuing their policy for $50,000. Before the policy was issued Barrymore had to make affidavit that he is not now engaged to be married and does not contemplate matrimony. This is a unique policy for a theatrical manager to take out but not much stranger than many others which Lloyds have issued. Whether Lloyds is assuming a great risk is now a popular subject of speculation along the Great White Way. Barrymore is known to be extremely susceptible to feminine charms. A list of the beauties to whom he has from time to time been reported as engaged would occupy a good deal of space. Miss Maude Adams was one of the first, though she is much older than Barrymore. Then of course there was Evelyn Nesbit Thaw. Bonnie Maginn, Vivian Blackburn, Elsie Janis, the late Lotta Faust and Ida Conquest were others to whom he was reported as paying devotion. Miss Grace Lane, a Chicago beauty, had her named associated with his and when Mrs. Felix Isman, wife of the theatrical man, secured a divorce, it was thought that she might become Mrs. Jack Barrymore. Just who the latest divinity of his worship is it would be difficult to say but no doubt he will be careful to keep his heart away from the melting influence of womanly wiles while his managers are paying for that strange policy of insurance.

Odd Things in the World

Mrs. James Creamer of Springfield, Ohio, supplied from her hennery a good share of the "strictly fresh" eggs that the wealthy classes of Springfield ate for their breakfasts all last winter. When the hens struck, late in the fall, Mrs. Creamer was well launched in the egg business and simply had to have eggs to supply her customers. Some humorist told her that chickens were fond of music and she decided to experiment. With the kitchen door open so her fowls could plainly hear, she played the piano the major portion of one day. To her surprise the next day she got six more eggs than had been her daily allotment since the cold weather made its appearance. Mrs. Creamer then moved her piano further out toward the egg foundry and went after the instrument like a nailer. The hens, touched by the efforts for their relief from the winter's ennui, bestirred themselves a little, with results financially satisfactory to all concerned.

Richmond Castle, which may shortly become the property of the British government, was originally one of the strongest of Norman keeps. It was probably founded by Alan Rufus, one of the sons of the Duke of Brittany, who took a prominent part in the suppression of the Saxons. At a later age the castle passed into the possession of Edmund Tudor, who married Margaret Beaufort and became the father of Henry VII. Henry was born Earl of Richmond and he bestowed the title upon the magnificent palace which when King of England he built upon the banks of the Thames. Thus the Richmond beloved of cockneys has a comparatively modern origin. The curfew, by the way, is still rung from the tower of Richmond Castle at 6 a. m. and 8 p. m., a custom "that has continued ever since the time of William the Conqueror."

One of the best Irish bulls on record is that which was once reported by an Englishman, who, while traveling in Ireland, stopped to inquire of an Irishman who lived in a certain house they were just passing.

The Irishman replied: "That is Mr. O'Hare's house, and if he had lived until tomorrow he would be one week dead."

Unselfish Woman

"My dear girl, I'm simply delighted to see you. It's so good of you to come 'way out here to see me. I was just crazy to see you, and I thought of telephoning, but we have to pay now by the message. . . . It just seems providential that you came today. . . . I have a few favors to ask of you. You are so good to me, and I have always appreciated your kindness, haven't I? . . . Well, it's just this: Tommy Jones is to be in town this week (he has written to me that he is coming), and I simply must see him. Now, you know how fearfully jealous my husband is, and if he thought that I saw Tommy he would act awfully. He is so ill-bred at time. What I want to do is to just run off with Tom to some obscure beach cafe and lunch with him. Won't you go along, dear? You know you could sketch or read all day, and it would make it all right if Dick ever found it out. . . . I know that you are dreadfully busy, but a day off would do you a world of good. . . . And, dear, there is another little favor I want you to do for me. I sha'n't be able to get to town this week. My modiste (you know, my new one) simply demands a deposit upon my new gown before she sends it out to me. I cannot ask Dick for any more money this month. If you will go to see madame and make a small deposit on the gown, it would appease her absurd demands. . . . I'll make it all right with you the first of the month. Tell her I'll send her the cheque for the rest when the gown is delivered. You will make it all right, won't you, dear? . . . My dear girl, I haven't told you about Charlie St. Charles, have I? He is adorable and he quite worships me. We have such a fascinating little affair on. Well, he asked me if I would dine with him, some evening, in town. I wrote to him, of course, but my note sounded a trifle compromising, so I just signed your name to it. I knew that you wouldn't care, because you are not married, dear, and it doesn't make any difference to you. . . . Of course he understands. I just told you, because his letters will be addressed to you, and you know his handwriting, so won't open them, of course. . . . Must you go, dear, I'm so glad that you came. . . . Oh, yes, won't you stop in at my jeweler's this evening and tell them to send me my pearls? They keep them in their safe now, when I'm not wearing them. Dick and I are going to a concert Thursday night. . . . Oh, dear me, it's raining, isn't it? Too bad! I'd have James drive you to the station, but I do hate to have the horses taken out in the rain. I guess it won't spoil your gown. . . . Goodbye, dear. You won't forget about the pearls, will you?"

—The Cynic.

In the taking of testimony, an Irishman, who was a witness, had been bullyragged (by the opposing counsel) to the extent that he left the room furious, and, after the meeting, declared: "He wud smash the blagarrad in th' face."

The attorney, whose witness the Irishman was, mildly remonstrated, and said: "Why, Pat, if you would do that you would soon be sorry for it."

Pat meditated a few seconds and then replied:

"Woll, whiniver Oi d' anything loike that, thot Oi'm sorry for—Oi'm dom glad of it."

The Papers and Mary Scott

It would be difficult to recall a tragedy which the newspapers have exploited with the frankness which they have lavished on the death of unfortunate Mary Scott Castle. That there are many details of the murder which it is impossible to publish may be inferred by anybody reading between the lines of the cable despatches. Nevertheless the papers have published much information of a character which does not usually escape the pencil of the copy reader. References to certain physical abnormalities discovered by the autopsy surgeons have been frequent, despite the evil effect which they are bound to have by exciting the morbid curiosity of immature minds. Very bluntly too have the papers spoken of certain physical defects in the dead woman which did not have the effect of lessening her husband's love. Such details are clearly beyond the pale of legitimate newspaper exploitation and the dailies should be severely condemned for giving them publicity. If the murder of the unhappy beauty involved certain psychopathic conditions with which physicians are usually familiar the public is not entitled to know about them any more than it has the right to enter a clinic for sightseeing purposes.

Mary Scott's Father

I have nowhere seen it stated in the exhaustive accounts of the Scott family that Mary's father, H. H. Scott, known as Colonel Scott on account of the commission he held in the Confederate Army, was the elisor of the Wallace Grand Jury. That was the famous grand jury which drove Chris Buckley across the Canadian frontier. In this connection a curious coincidence has been noted by a friend of the family and that is the strange similarity between the fate of Colonel Scott and Chief Biggy, the elisor of the Oliver Grand Jury. Those were the two most noted grand juries which we have had and the elisors of both met with great misfortune. Colonel Scott lost his money and suffered a great many hardships as well as trials in his domestic life. Chief Biggy was equally the prey of misfortune.

How She Met Charlton

Another oversight in the newspaper accounts of the tragedy of Lake Como is still more surprising. Apparently the papers do not know that Charlton was first introduced to Mary Scott Castle by the same Craig whom she attempted to kill in the "Peacock Alley" of the Waldorf-Astoria. This face helps to weld the chain of poor Mary's life into a strong succession of tragic circumstances, one connected with the other by a fate from which it almost seemed that she could not escape. Whether the untold story of that Craig shooting will be published as a result of the tragedy remains to be seen. Some there are in this city who could tell it if they would. Whenever they returned from a trip East they always brought some story of poor Mary's struggles against adversity. I have always thought, when listening to these accounts, that pity was the emotion above all others which should be exercised in connection with her downward pace. If ever a woman made a brave stand to the limit of her endurance it was Mary Scott. Whether her endurance of hardship was as great as that of some other women is beside the question. Assuredly she was not brought up to cope with trouble but rather to bask in prosperity.

annoyances of summering abroad. It will be seen that, although born abroad, she has ideas of her own about the attractions of continental travel. Mrs. Scott is doing a great deal for the girls of the younger set, entertaining them down at Burlingame and at the Hotel St. Francis continually, and if there is such a malady as summer lassitude, it has not lessened the warmth of Mrs. Scott's hospitality. Miss Lilian Goss, cousin of Mrs. Scott, is the incentive for much entertaining these summer afternoons and evenings. She came from England a few days ago, accompanying Miss Florence Hopkins across the continent. Miss Goss is a charming young woman who fulfills one's idea of the ideal English lass, being soft-spoken, with the most adorable accent and a pianissimo kind of vivacity which loses nothing in the babel of the somewhat insistent talk of our San Francisco society girls. It is a tribute to the English ideals to observe how the American girls pause in their chatter to utilize the soft pedal when in the presence of a sweet golden-voiced young person like Miss Goss. Mrs. Scott gave a luncheon in honor of Miss Goss a few days ago at the Hotel St. Francis, entertaining about a dozen girls, among them the Misses Helene Irwin, Martha Calhoun, Mary Keeney, Marian and Elizabeth Newhall, Linda Cadwalader and Florence Hopkins. Mrs. Scott, who looked sweet and summery in a most becoming frock of old blue chiffon with a plume-laden hat of the same color, was the ideal hostess, the contagious charm of her personality making each of her guests appear at her very best, and when she led them out of the dining room, the group circled about her in admiration. Later on all of them attended a matinee. That is the way society entertains these languid days.

Society would not be surprised to hear of the engagement of a charming young lady who lives out at the end of Pacific avenue to the son of wealthy parents living in California street. For some time their devotion has been displayed with little effort at concealment.

Feminine Fight Fans

Is the feminine interest in the Fourth of July scrimmage another manifestation of woman's determination to be man's equal? Is it a tangent of the "feminine unrest," a hankering for new diversions? Or what is it that is causing so many women to be interested in the prize fight that the managers have actually been compelled to make special provisions for their feminine guests? Women have attended the fights before this, but never so openly nor in such numbers as they bid fair to attend on the coming world-occasion. Tex Rickard himself is authority for the statement that Ethel Barrymore is now en route to this coast in a private car with her husband and some twenty friends, coming here ostensibly for the fight. Miss Barrymore has attended several fights and was one of the "rooters" at one of the contests between Nelson and Britt a few seasons ago. She is an enthusiast on the subject of prize fights and far from being reticent about this matter, has on several occasions taken pains to explain to her horrified women friends just why she considered it worth her time to witness a display which the average woman considers nothing but brutality systematized by certain rules.

A Tea Table Symposium

"Only those who have never seen a prize fight condemn it. A good fight, by men perfectly trained, is educational in its effect. To see a human being carry out his determination to the last atom of his endurance is a sight to thrill one with its elemental appeal," commented a certain well-known society woman in this town who is confiding to her friends her determination to see the fight even if she has to take her place on the roof of one of the nearby sky-scrapers where many other women plan to obtain a long-distance glimpse through their field glasses. "I'm sending all my boys to see it, for I'm convinced it will do them good," broke in another woman among the coterie discussing the coming battle over their tea at the Hotel St. Francis the other afternoon. "A boy who thrills at seeing a test of this kind will never be in danger of being a molly-coddle," was her blunt rejoinder to the remark of another who said something about bullies alone caring about such things. Whatever may be the root of the interest, it is a fact that the prize fight is a topic that enters largely into the conversation of the afternoon tea coteries. Many of the young fellows whose families are prominent in the social activities hereabouts are coming home from school in time for it. The two Baker boys, Wakefield and Livingstone, will be guests of their father who has been promising them this treat for the past year. Of course the men will all be there or wishing they were, but the entrance of prominent women into a prize fight arena is something so novel that even San Francisco, unconventional as it is, is somewhat shocked at the idea and everyone is very anxious to see who will occupy that row of boxes being especially built for the women who have purchased tickets for the bruising contest.

Midshipman John Lawrence Kauffman whose marriage to Miss Elsa Draper has been halted because he has not been able to pass his ensign exam is one of the most popular of the masculine afternoon entertainers. Several times a week the young naval fighter comes over from San Rafael with his affianced and gives a tea party at the Palace. The girls invited to these tea parties are enthusiastic about his ability as a host.

From Banker to Pedagogue

"Billy" Gring is going to take up the ferule. For some time past he has been tired of banking and will soon resign his position with the Crocker National to open a school for boys at Santa Barbara. This news will come as a surprise to his many friends and their surprise will be tinged with regret, for "Billy" is one of the most popular members of society. He is one of the few young society chaps who is just as popular with the chaperons as with the buds, having the rare faculty of treating old and young with equal courtesy. As he is a graduate of an eastern university and enjoyed also the benefit of European training there is not much doubt about his qualifications for pedagogy.

A New Argument for Suffrage

For originality of thought and action I am quite willing to match the suffragettes against any other women this side of Mars. 'Tis indeed a dull day when the suffragettes do not think of some unique argument for the advancement of their darling project. Not all of their argumenta ad hominem appeal to my sense of the fitness of things and a good many of them only touch my sense of humor, but in all fairness I must admit that these brainy women occasionally hit the nail squarely on the head. Take the human flower show held this week as an instance. The human flower show was a happy thought born in the minds of the members of the Votes for Women Club. To whom the particular credit for this inspiration is due I cannot say, but no doubt the officers of the club are entitled to divide it share and share alike. These officers are Mrs. Mary McHenry Keith, honorary president; Miss Selina Solomons, acting president; Mrs. Isabel Johnson, vice-president; Mrs. Lehman Blum, treasurer; and Mrs. Francesca Pierce, secretary.

An Old Charge Refuted

The human flower show conducted by these clever women was an exhibition of babies and its particular purpose was "to demonstrate to the community that its finest babies and young children are the offspring of suffragists." Here is a pat argument indeed, for it has long been objected against the champions of the ballot for women that they are interested in politics to the detriment of children. Being a mere man with only a man's courage I did not attend the human flower show, but I have it on expert authority that the exhibition of infantile blooms was a sweeping refutation of the charge so frequently fired at the suffragists. My informant tells me that among the youngsters at the show were the two children of Mrs. Casimiro D. Rubio, wife of the former vice-consul from Guatemala. I am given to understand that Mrs Rubio is a tower of strength to the suffrage cause, for her children are as beautiful as any ever shown in a baby show of non-political tendencies. "Little George Rubio," says my authority, "is a lovely boy with a glory of curling dark brown hair and big laughing brown eyes and is brighter than a gold piece, though not much bigger. Adelita, his sister, is a pure type of Spanish beauty with large dark eyes, dark brown hair, a pink and pure white skin—the sort of loveliness that gives promise of a beautiful woman." I am told further that there were others equally pretty, all the children of suffragist mothers. As I take a bachelor's respectful interest in lovely kids I can see that my prejudice against suffragists is going to decrease. This human flower show is the best argument I have ever heard for the cause.

Town Talk foreshadowed the engagement of Miss Mary Josselyn and Signor Ettore Avenelli some time ago. There were protestations then that no romance was in petto but the event has proved the correctness of the prediction.

Miss Ewing's Recital

A large and musically representative audience filled the parlors of Hugo Mansfeldt's resident, 238 Cole street, Wednesday evening, June 8, on the occasion of a piano recital by one of his pupils, Miss Lorraine Ewing. Though still in her early teens, Miss Ewing showed a sympathetic grasp of the composers' moods and a breadth of interpretation which reflected much credit on her art as a pianist and the method of her teacher. The character of the program was such as to bring out much versatility and daintiness of execution. Through it all ran a technique and a brilliancy and delicacy of shading which only the highest instruction can impart and only the receptive nature of the true artist can grasp. The program was as follows: Dans le Bois, Earle; Melody, Paderewski; Minuet, Mozart; Traeumerei, Schumann; Witches Dance, MacDowell; Nocturne, op. 32, No. 1, Chopin; Waltz, op. 64, No. 2, Chopin; Romance, op. 44, Rubinstein; Kamennoi Ostrow, Rubinstein; Mazurka, op. 24, No. 2, Leschetizky; Moment Musicale, Schubert; Pas des Marionnettes, Pessard; Two Lyric Pieces, Grieg; Habanera, op. 3, No. 1, Drangosch; Titania, Wely. The members of the Mansfeldt Club who assisted in receiving the guests were Miss Frances Buckland, president; Miss Phoebe Brutscher, Miss Josephine Coonan, Miss Laura Ferguson, Miss Hazel Hess; Miss Esther Hjelte, Miss Edith Sellers, Miss Grace St. John, Miss Geraldine St. John, Miss Selma Werner, Miss Edna Willcox, Miss Frances Wilson, Miss Bernice Levy and Miss Grace Sullivan.

In the Social Spotlight

The Honorable John G. Stewart and Mrs. Stewart of Castle Aulterharrie, Dumblane, Scotland, Mr. and Mrs. Chas. C. Stewart of London, England, Major A. Buchanan Ritchie and Mrs. Ritchie and Mr. Ellis A. Hayman of Nairns, Scotland, were for the past two weeks the guests of their cousins, the John D. MacKenzies of San Jose.

There were many additions to the "service set" at the hotels this week. Captain J. E. Normyle, U. S. A., and Mrs. Normyle are at the Palace. Captain Normyle was formerly stationed at the Presidio and has many friends here.

First Lieutenant Frederick Bussebe of the Fourteenth Infantry is at the Palace

Lieutenant Commander D. E. Theleen, U. S. N., and Mrs. Theleen are registered at the Fairmont.

Mrs. Uriel Sebree, wife of the popular read-admiral (retired), has deserted the "service set" for a time. She has left the Fairmont, going to Coronado where Admiral Sebree will later join her. Mrs. Sebree's father resides at Coronado.

Miss Violet Buckley was hostess at one of the pretty luncheons of last week at the Fairmont, and also entertained a pretty group of ten girls for tea in the Laurel Court of the Fairmont.

The orchestra at the Palace is Hoffman's, one of the standbys of "old" San Francisco when it was famed from coast to coast and was regarded as one of the features of the Palace. There are ten pieces and Hoffman himself plays the first violin. At the luncheon hour the music is light, dashing, catchy. During the tea hour, 4 until 5 o'clock, Hoffman has a splendid selection of great variety. At the dinner hour the program is of a high classical order.

Mr. and Mrs. Clem Tobin are frequent luncheon guests at the Palace.

Mr. and Mrs. J. Parker Whitney entertained at a pretty dinner party at the Palace Hotel last week.

Mrs. Walter Scott Franklin is a popular tea hostess, and entertained during the week with several delightful functions in the Laurel Court of the Fairmont.

Mr. and Mrs. E. F. Fritz and Miss Fritz of San Francisco motored down to the Vendome for the week end.

A Very Lucky Star

Willie Collier is one of the luckiest stars twinkling in American theaterdom. While other stars may come and go with the erratic movements of Halley's Comet, Willie Collier keeps right on shining in season and out. It is a long time since Collier began to be a star and he shows no signs of tiring. His endurance, as his friend James J. Corbett might put it, is tiptop. Never was Willie Collier so lucky as this season and yet his luck is founded on ill-luck. Paradoxical though this may appear, it is true. Willie Collier has the ill-luck this season to appear in an inferior play, but he has the good luck to "get away with it." If "A Lucky Star" is a poor play Willie Collier is proportionately lucky in making it go. And Collier makes it go. With any other comedian except Nat Goodwin at the head of the company, "A Lucky Star" would be a disastrous failure. It is thin to attenuation and so weak that it almost stops going in the last act. A great deal of its humor depends on the personal eccentricities of the characters and these eccentricities are frequently of the made-to-order variety. But lucky Willie Collier saves the play. Being an institution he has but to appear to arouse enthusiasm and he misses no opportunity to broaden the comic possibilities of his part. The result is that Collier keeps the audience so busy laughing at his sayings and doings that there is no time to pick the play to pieces. As a tour de force this redounds to Collier's credit as an actor but of course it is not wholly satisfactory. A good comedian like Willie Collier should not be wasted on an inferior play. He ought to have a play which would compel him to exert himself. Collier doesn't have to exert himself in "A Lucky Star." There is no acting for him to do and his lines and business are of the conventional order, never rising to any rare quality. Actors and managers are always complaining of the dearth of good plays and one is forced to believe in the sincerity of their plaint after seeing an actor like Collier in a play like "A Lucky Star." Will somebody please write Collier another "Dictator"?

"Eithul," an Irish Opera

From a friend in Dublin I have just received an interesting account of the production in the Gaiety Theater of "Eithul," an opera written in Irish with music by Mr. Robert O'Dwyer. Of the splendid work which a little band of Irish writers and musicians is doing in Dublin we hear too little in this country, so it is worth while quoting from the letter of my correspondent. He says:

"A complete original opera with text entirely in Irish might justly attract attention as a novelty, and claim Irish suffrages as a patriotic novelty; but Mr. O'Dwyer's work has merits which, while leaving it national, make it of universal interest. Not only does it promise much—for it is a first work—but it already gives much; it displays a real power of melodic invention, considerable command of the secrets of harmony and instrumentation, a sense of dramatic expression, and a happy skill in working up fine ensemble effects. Mr. O'Dwyer undoubtedly possesses original power and has developed it by study and self-training. His style at present is perhaps somewhat too obviously wrought of many strands—now the decidedly Irish coloring of a phrase or harmony strikes us; now we recognize a student of Wagner; at other times we feel ourselves in the bright light atmosphere of Verdi or Balfe. It may be that later on this ecclecticism will develop into a more clearly definite personal style. But meantime we are given something that very decidedly succeeds in pleasing all tastes—the graver and the gayer, the more national and the more cosmopolitan.

"The libretto of 'Eithul' sets before us a legend from the romantic lore of ancient pagan Ireland. It tells of Ceart, the High King's son, who is intrigued against by his step-brothers but protected by his foster-mother who is really a fairy godmother in disguise. There is also a rare fairyland maiden, Eithul, princess of Tir-na-n-Oge who is wooed and has to be won out of the Land of Eternal Youth by the resolute courage of the hero. There is the enchanted Queen, her mother, condemned to wander on earth as a bird who sings a song of marvelous beauty. A chorus of warriors contribute stirring masculine strains; while the warblings of Eithul's dreamlike attendants throw around us the web of a mystic spell. The tale may not be very coherent, the two acts may lack unity, but there is sufficient opportunity for pretty stage-effects and for varied music."

My correspondent adds that owing to the death of the King and the consequent absence of Viceregal patronage the opera was not as successful financially as it was artistically. However it won such marked critical as well as popular approval that there is some hope of its being presented in this country. That certainly is something to be looked forward to with eagerness by all music-lovers.

—The Music Lover.

In "The Awakening of Helena Richie" at the Columbia Theater

Henry Arthur Jones on the Drama

At a recent conversazione in London Henry Arthur Jones, one of the greatest living English dramatists, read a paper on "Character in Drama." It was a meaty discourse and should be called to the attention of our American playwrights who have much to learn from a master craftsman like Jones. American plays frequently show virility and originality of ideas but seldom possess the technical excellence of works by Jones and Pinero. From what Jones says it may be inferred that the reason of this defect is the inability of our dramatists to grasp the fundamental difference between Nature and the theater. Mr. Jones points out that Nature has from thirty to seventy years in which to portray every detail of a human character while the dramatist has only from ten minutes to half an hour. "From this enormous difference, in the conditions which bind the dramatist as compared with Nature arises the fact," he says, "that, while Nature mainly shows human beings as mere disjointed bundles of inconsistencies, the dramatist has mainly to show them as concise, homogeneous, purposeful, direct, and moving towards a self-conscious end. Again, every one of the dramatist's characters have to be delineated in a sharply outlined concurrent scheme of action and to be strictly subordinated or rather reconciled, to the contingencies and necessities of that scheme of action." From this sound premise Mr. Jones draws a conclusion equally sound, namely, that it is useless to pour ideas into a play—to fill it with philosophy and moral purpose—unless the play contains a carefully planned scheme of action. He argues that the play must be a definite, connected series of doings and not an indefinite, unconnected series of sayings. He adds that character must always be strictly related to the scheme of action of the play. Perhaps Mr. Jones had George Bernard Shaw in mind when he made this declaration of the prime requisites of drama. The Shavian method of play writing is popular in this country because it is easy to follow whereas the Jones method, the Pinero method requires concentrated thought and is extremely difficult. It is also popular in Germany where some of the most talked-of plays of the day are also the most formless. In the plays of Jones and Pinero no character ever delivers an apothegm or a witticism that does not flow out of the immediate situation. In American plays the dramatist does not curb his brilliance or his humor through a sense of impropriety. It follows that good situations are too often marred by lugged-in preachments and epigrams. The dramatists have not yet learned the lesson of restraint. When they do our dramatic output will be immensely improved.

Margaret Anglin's Return

Next Monday evening at the Columbia Margaret Anglin, after an absence of several seasons, will return at the head of her own company. The play is "The Awakening of Helena Richie" which a San Francisco playwright, Charlotte Thompson, adapted for her from Margaret Deland's novel. The story of the play closely follows Mrs. Deland's book and the principle incidents have been transmitted to the stage by Miss Thompson, who has been much praised for the conservative manner in which she made her adaptation. Miss Anglin's work in this play has been highly praised and the play itself comes with a flattering record. Miss Anglin promises to revive at a special matinee next Friday Henry Arthur Jones' masterpiece "Mrs. Dane's Defence." There will be the usual Wednesday and Saturday matinees of "Helena Richie" in addition to the special Friday matinee.

A Revival of "Iris"

Virginia Harned's third week at the Alcazar will commence with an elaborate production of "Iris," the play in which she scored the most emphatic and prolonged success of her career. It was her exclusive vehicle during several seasons and she appeared in it at the old Columbia Theater about seven years ago. Supporting the star in "Iris" will be William Courtenay as Trenwith, and the cream of the Alcazar company in appropriate roles. Each of the five acts calls for a sumptuous setting, the action taking place in Mrs. Bellamy's house near London, her villa near the Lake of Como and her flat in London.

The Orpheum Bill

Vesta Victoria will be the headliner for one more week at the Orpheum. It had been intended to terminate her season here this week, but the announcement called forth such a storm of protests from the public that the Orpheum authorities rearranged her route. For her last week Miss Victoria promises a program of novelties which will exhibit her to the very best advantage. A charming exhibition will be given by Maud and Gladys Finney, two attractive girls who are veritable "Mermaid Sisters" and whose aquatic feats are said to be very spectacular. Peter Donald, the Scotch comedian, and Meta Carson, his bonnie lassie, will appear in the comedy sketch, "Alex McLean's Dream." A merry en-

Franklin and the Standards, Warren and Blanchard and Grigolati's Aerial Ballet. By request the motions pictures depicting the funeral of King Edward VII will be presented for next week only.

Yiddish Star Coming

The announcement is made that the celebrated Yiddish actor David Kessler, at the head of his own company from the Thalia Theater, New York, will make his appearance at the Van Ness for three evenings and a

MISS ANNA WOODWARD

Sunday matinee performance commencing Friday night, June 24. Among the principal people in support will be Miss Rosa Karp and Mme. Clara Young. At all the performances with the exception of the Sunday matinee, the great sensation, "The Jewish Heart," will be the bill and from all accounts Kessler has made a tremendous impression in the stellar role. The drama is the work of the well known playwright Joseph Lateimer and enjoyed an entire season's run in New York City. At the matinee on Sunday, June 26, the bill will be "Yankel de Schmid" by David Pinsky. Complete productions of both plays are promised.

Idora Attractions

Few people ever heard of Thaviu and his band before the little Russian brought his organization to Idora Park last Tuesday, but judging from the reception he received by the music lovers at "the park beautiful" during the week, his name will be a familiar one before the next three weeks pass by. His programs are out of the ordinary and please the audience by their originality. The vocalists, Herr Max Bing, the baritone and Miss Anna Woodward, the soprano, are among the best ever heard at the park. Another feature is the company of Russian singers and dancers who appear at the close of every concert.

Kingly Tastes in Plays

The list of plays which the late King Edward and his successor, the present George V., attended last year has been printed by London "Sketch." Edward VII. witnessed "An Englishman's Home," "The Dancing Girl," "Henry of Navarre," "The Earth," "Mr. Preedy and the Countess," "The Arcadians," "The Woman in the Case," "L'Assommoir," "His Borrowed Plumes," "The Best People," "Arsene Lupin" and "The Whip." The last named he saw twice. In addition, at Windsor there were commanded performances of "Trilby," "The Lyons Mail" and "The Little Damozel." The last time he attended the playhouse was to see "Alias Jimmy Valentine." George, during the same year, saw "An Englishman's Home," "The Prisoner of Zenda," "Henry of Navarre," "Our Miss Gibbs," "The School of Scandal," "The Arcadians," "The Woman in the Case," "His Borrowed Plumes," "The Best People," "False Gods," "The Whip" and "Arsene Lupin." "Our Miss Gibbs" had the honor of three visits. It is interesting to note that "An Englishman's Home," "The Arcadians" and "Arsene Lupin" have been conspicuous among the popular attractions in the United States the past year. "Our Miss Gibbs," which King George witnessed three times, will be produced in this country in the autumn, with Miss Pauline Chase in the title role.

Mrs. Fiske will follow Margaret Anglin at the Columbia. She will present Ibsen's "Pillars of Society" and the double bill, "Hannele" and "The Green Cockatoo."

Rose Stahl is to make a tour of the Pacific Coast early next season and will include this city in her itinerary.

William Collier's engagement at the Columbia Theater in "A Lucky Star" will come to a close this Saturday night.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—Several unfavorable factors seemed to be responsible for another sharp decline in stocks at the close of this week after the rally starting last Monday. Pessimism and much bear talk were found throughout the commission house element of Wall street. The sharp break in copper stocks was largely responsible for this sentiment as it was supposed to reflect the position of a powerful banking syndicate toward the general market. The heavy decline in Chicago and Alton stock was another factor that created a great deal of mistrust toward the so-called Hawley group of securities, as it now appears that the dividend on Alton will undoubtedly be discontinued at the next meeting. The conference of western shippers with President Taft was an element of uncertainty. We are rather of the opinion that good stocks can be bought now on further weakness.

Wheat—Only the initial marketings from a State heretofore hardly counted in the wheat crop reckoning were sufficient at the close last week to dissipate fears of July manipulation here and to start some rather far-reaching liquidation. The conditions long predicted in these columns have begun in a mild way in the southwest and bid fair to continue until an export outlet is found for at least a portion of the 1910 crop. A little of the new crop Texas wheat has found its way to market and disclosed an unwilling and independent attitude on the part of the millers and an impossible situation for the exporters. The effect has been to induce some of the Kansas millers to part with some of their old wheat and prepare for readjustment of values to the new crop basis. The Texas crop is a large and fine one, but such of it as is offered for sale must seek a market equipped with funds and with warehouse facilities. The coming crop year starts with old wheat in liquidation on the bargain counter, millers not yet recovered from over-speculation born of the conditions of a year ago and an export outlet apparently so far out of reach as to be contemplated with much distaste by the trade in general. In another week with favoring weather wheat cutting will begin in Southern Illinois and Missouri.

Corn—Corn was stubbornly strong and ranged higher most of the week because of the unseasonable weather for the growing crop. Latterly the weather has improved and corn has weakened. Farmers' offerings dried up as the market advanced, but their sales of futures since the return of warmer weather have increased rapidly.

Cotton—Evolution, bordering on revolution, is working many radical changes in the cotton market, out of which will surely come general improvement in the cultivation of the plant, the method of buying, selling, the conditions under which the bales are moved from the fields, handled, stored and then sent to the factories, and in the financing of the industry. This is all necessary, and on account of the higher price of cotton, it is reasonable to state that for the above reasons, mostly founded on economies, the larger the crop, the cheaper relatively it will be to the spinner. In textiles the situation is getting worse, cotton goods ruling easy at new low levels and hard on sales; business in prints at Fall River last week amounting to 55,000 pieces, about one-quarter of the normal output. Of late weather conditions were favorable to the growing crop, beneficial rains and cooler weather having displaced the warm dry weather in the southwest last week, the rains having been general in Texas, which removes the possibility of a drought for another long period. These are the rains, we stated in our letter of two weeks ago, that we looked for by June 15. These rains will go a long way to help the fruit to mature. Rains were also had in the central and eastern portions of the belt, being beneficial in localities, particularly in Southern Georgia. In the meantime the local stock of cotton is decreasing very rapidly and we therefore see the possibility of a good squeeze in the July option, but feel sanguine as to the ultimate outcome of prices for the new crop which we unhesitatingly state should soon see a much lower level, though in the meantime there may be numerous opportunities to safely scalp the market of from thirty to fifty points.

Copper—Having weathered the bearish news from Washington, with virtually no decline in prices, the metal remains unchanged on the reported improvement in the railroad rate situation. Electrolytic is still at 12½ to 13 cents, with the United Metals Selling Company firm at the latter quotation. Good sales of June, July and August copper are reported at these figures with a stronger tone to inquiries during the last few days. Sellers say there is nothing in sight that will send prices off and we look for a slowly improving market for the metal. Although the Copper Producers' figures for May showed an increase of about 18,000,000 pounds surplus over April's, this statement does not include the sales of early May copper which should help to make for a better report for the current month and more especially for July. Last Monday a report came out that Ryan had sold 100,000,000 pounds of copper in Europe, and in consequence the copper stocks market assumed a stronger tone. Although the stock of copper metal on hand is the highest for the year, yet, it is believed to be below that of last year and with the ever-increasing demand for its usage, especially the demand from foreign consumers, there seems but little doubt of reduction of the large surplus on hand. This sentiment is reflected in the strengthening of the New York Stock Exchange and Boston copper stocks in which we believe we will soon see higher prices for the more economically run and cheaper producing standard companies.

Local Securities—The local market for stocks and bonds continues to drag, showing but few changes. Barring activities in Associated Oil and Pacific Gas and Electric common, prices generally are stationary with rather an inclination to decline. Associated Oil, since its listing on the New York Stock Exchange, has been the local market leader and, while its fluctuations are very narrow, sales of the stock run far ahead of any of the other issues. Pacific Gas and Electric common seems to be in the process of a steady enhancement in price, one day's quotation showing a slight gain over the day previous. This is thought to be the result of the company's enormous earnings, coupled with the bright prospects of a satisfactory dividend by the end of the year. Alaska Packers has been advanced lately but seems to lack the ginger of its former upward moves. The bond market is practically at a standstill, only a nominal demand being shown for even the issues heretofore most active. The general impression seems to prevail that next month will see the last of the present period of dullness in the local market and that by next fall the more popular of the California securities will again show a healthy demand at advancing prices. This may especially be said of Associated Oil and Pacific Gas and Electric common in view of the fact that satisfactory dividends on both of these stocks seem assured early next year. In that event it would not be unreasonable to expect them to double in price over their present quotations.

The Sweep and the Girl

he remains in ecstasy under the windows of the adorable young girl. Will that do?"

"Indeed, it will!"

"I continue: The morning after, Edmee, sleeping in her little white bed, sees the little sweep emerge from the chimney of her room. He throws himself ingenuously on the delightful child and covers her with little sooty O's, quite round. I've forgotten to tell you that she has beauty of a wondrous kind. Countess Lordknowswho surprises him in his pleasant occupation. She cries, she calls. He is so busy that he neither sees nor hears her."

"My dear Hammer!"

"He is so busy that he neither sees nor hears her. The count rushes in. He has the soul of a gentleman. He takes the little sweep by the seat of his trousers, which happens to be uppermost at the moment, and flings him out of the window."

"My dear Hammer—"

"I'll cut the story short. Some months later the little sweep marries the young lady—and it was only just in time! There you have the result of charity well bestowed."

"My dear Hammer, you have set my head spinning like a top!"

"Don't believe anything of the kind! I finish. Having married Lady Lordknowswho, the little sweep inherits a large fortune, and is ruined on the race course. Today he is a master chimney-sweep at Camberwell. His wife keeps a shop in the old Kent Road, and sells alarm clocks.

"My dear Hammer, it's not at all funny!"

"Take care, my dear Horteur! What I have just told you is intrinsically 'The Fall of an Angel,' by Lamartine, and the 'Eloa' of Alfred de Vigny. And, all things considered it is worth more than your touching little stories which lead readers to imagine they are good people, whilst really they are not good at all; that they do good whilst not doing so, that it is easy for them to be beneficent, whilst it is the most difficult thing in the world. My story is a moral one. Moreover, it is optimistic and has a happy ending. For Edmee found in the shop in the Old Kent Road the happiness she would have sought for in vain at 'At Homes' and garden parties if she had married a diplomat or a Permanent Under-Secretary. My dear editor, tell me, will you accept 'Edmee; or, Charity Well Bestowed,' for the 'New Century Illustrated'?"

"And do you ask this seriously?"

"I ask you seriously. If you don't like my story I will publish it elsewhere."

"Where?"

"In a bourgeois paper."

"I defy you to!"

"You will see!"

The Autocar Company, realizing the vital necessity of proper lubrication, has just issued an oiling diagram showing in detail the oiling system of the Autocar. There are also attached printed instructions as to how often and to what extent to apply the lubricant to each part. This idea on the part of the Autocar Company is unique in its originality and should be of great assistance to all Autocar owners, as it makes the lubrication of the machine simplicity itself. Walter C. Morris, the local Autocar distributor, is in receipt of a number of these diagrams.

muzzle; guard and butt all I saw, and that was yellow mounted.

Jacob Curtis—Reside in San Francisco; there last May; saw defendant on the 14th, on Montgomery street; said "How do you do, Judge?" he replied, "Very well"; he gave me an introduction to Mr. Whiteman at the same time; this was near Dan's Saloon, between Commercial and Clay streets; Judge asked me to drink; did so; it was between four and five o'clock; Judge and I went in; said I'd take a brandy punch; Whiteman said he'd take lager beer; Judge said he'd take a gin cocktail; before the drinks were ready, a lad came in and said, "You are wanted"; lad said he wanted Whiteman's pistol; Whiteman drew it out and laid it on the counter; I took hold of it; says I, "It's a noble pistol"; his reply was, "Yes, it will shoot two hundred yards"; says I, "You had better be careful who you let have the pistol, or you may lose it"; young man went off; we drank our liquor off then; he asked me, "Don't you know Jimmy?" I said I knew him by reputation; lad took the pistol with him; we talked there for a few moments; told them they must excuse me, as I had to go to the post office; then McGowan or Whiteman said, "We'll go out and see what they want of us"; then I went and put in a letter for Sacramento, but the boat had left—boats left at four o'clock; returned to Jackson street—got opposite Burch's Hotel; heard the report of a pistol; looked up Montgomery street and saw people running, and I ran and saw quite a crowd up the street before the Express Office—this was two or three minutes after the report. Between the time of leaving McGowan and hearing the report of the pistol, there was an interval of seven or eight or ten minutes; did not see King or Casey; didn't notice which way McGowan and Whiteman went from the drinking saloon; pistol was one of Colt's Navy revolvers—one of Colt's "first make," so said Whiteman; couldn't say which said, "We will go and see what they want of us"; no other person came in but the boy to speak to them.

Cross examination—Fifty-three years old; born in New Jersey; came here in '50; been in the lumber business; worked at planking roads; was a member of the Vigilance Committee; came to San Francisco last year, May 14th, from my men in Stockton street. It was after four o'clock; went down Washington street to Montgomery; post office in Washington street; found by the Monumental clock it was after four o'clock—two reasons by which I knew it was after four o'clock; was going up to see Mr. Perry after I found the mail was gone; no particular business with Perry; went up Montgomery till I saw the Judge; no one ever saw me drunk; generally find Perry at Biggs & Kibbe's; Dan keeps between Commercial and Clay streets; wanted to see Perry about contracts; near half a block from Dan's to Biggs & Kibbe's; got within a hundred feet of where I supposed Perry was, then turned and went to the post office with the intention of seeing Perry on coming back; don't know what made me alter my mind. Have known McGowan since '53 or '54; considered McGowan one of my friends; have been present with the Judge on several occasions; I first met him at the Monumental Engine House. McGowan introduced me to Whiteman; on same side with Dan's saloon; I took a brandy punch, Whiteman took lager beer and McGowan took a gin cocktail; while there boy came in; didn't know the boy; never seen the boy since—sure; never told anybody who the boy was; told persons it was not Butts; boy said, "You are wanted"—after that said Casey wanted Whiteman's pistol; Whiteman drew it and I took it; very large—six shooter; can tell a six shooter from a five shooter by looking at the size; the boy said "Casey wants Whiteman's pistol"; I picked it from the counter. Then the book took the pistol and went away. Then I said, "better be careful about who he let take the pistol." Then he asked me, "Don't you know Jimmy." Whiteman took out another pistol, which Whiteman said was a six shooter too. Couldn't say as to whether it was a yellow mounted pistol or not; then went out, McGowan and Whiteman following; they said they were going to see what Casey wanted.

Evening Session

The court was called at 7:30 o'clock.

Mr. Andrew J. Taylor—Reside 209 Clay street; dealer in fire-arms; was in San Francisco 14th of May, 1856; saw Mc Gowan that morning in my house; loaned him a navy pistol and a knife manufactured in my house; I loaded the pistol and loaded him a Derringer pistol; this happened on the day King was shot; Judge fetched the Derringer to my house; it was a gold mounted, plated or galvanized. Spring at cap box bro. e; did not repair the spring; in shooting order; a pistol of that kind I had sold; had not seen Casey just before that; did not see Casey that day; had not seen Casey or McGowan for a day or two before that; McGowan took the pistols and the knife with him; this was early in the morning.

Cross-examined—Dealer in guns, pistols, small guns and divers other things in shooting gallery; common for me to load pistols; McGowan not the only one who gets pistols loaded by me; demands being frequent for me to load pistols sometimes; didn't know Casey and McGowan were intimate friends; loaded a pistol for King that time; followed loading pistols before this; been in the pistol-loading business long time; been here since 1850; the practice of wearing arms is common in California; the leading men of San Francisco wear them; frequently persons come and discharge their pistols at my house and have them re-loaded; McGowan has been in the habit of having his pistols loaded by me for the last three or four years.

John Butts—Reside in San Francisco; was in San Francisco on the 14th of May; saw McGowan and Casey an hour or so before the shooting of King; saw Casey on Montgomery street and McGowan in the Bank Exchange; was sitting in the window of the Exchange and Casey came and asked me to tell the man with McGowan to come out; Peter Whiteman; know Peter; went in and told Whiteman, and he asked me who was the man wanting, and I told him Casey; I then left the saloon and went out to the street; McGowan said, "You go and see what he wants"; after that no more said; Judge and Whiteman went out after that; went and talked with Hamilton Bowie; saw no more of him; saw Casey when he shot King; at the time he shot King was talking with a boy called George Winslow—saw him shoot King; told King he was going to shoot him; he then fired—his coat falling off meanwhile; big sized revolver; couldn't tell whether King tried to shoot or not; he was walking with his hands or arms partly folded; when Casey came up to him he started back and received the shot; this was James King I was told; seemed to come from the Bulletin office; Casey was arrested by Mr. Byrne and Peter Whiteman; took him up Washington street; was afraid and then fled; was first man I ever saw shot and it made me feel very nervous—(laughter); saw him in Vigilance Committee rooms—last time I saw him he was hanging out of the window—(great laughter); saw McGowan once in Sacramento; don't know what become of Whiteman. "Saw him about San Francisco?" No, oh; no, not since the Vigilance Committee.

Cross-examined—After McGowan went up and spoke to Bowie, it was twenty minutes or half an hour before King was shot; the corner was a loafing corner; I had nothing around there; had the piece in the Bulletin and awaited the result; I was never before anybody but the Vigilance Committee; have lately been in prison; sometimes out—police take us out and make us work—(laughter); 13th of March first trouble and Judge Coon let me go; have been taken up for stealing a leg of mutton and for stealing money; never did steal any money, but the last time I was up before Judge Coon he was rather excited and so he sentenced me I suppose—(laughter).

Night Session

The Court re-assembled at twenty minutes to 10 o'clock, when counsel proceeded with the Testimony for the Defense.

Gen. James M. Estell—On the evening of May 14th, 1856—was on Montgomery street in front of office—on the opposite side of Pacific Express office, five or six doors to the north; office fifteen feet from Washington street; saw King shot; was in front of my office—was detained a few minutes after business hours which kept me there; had heard of no difficulty between King and Casey up to time I heard Casey's voice—not read the Bulletin of that evening; I heard Mr. Casey's voice speaking in a short and excited tone near the door of the Metropolitan Saloon; heard his angry voice in front of the Metropolitan Saloon saying, "Come on, come on," sharply; looked south and saw King about the center of the street facing Casey—both standing in rather a defiant attitude as I conceived (Gov. Foote objected), looking towards Casey with his arms folded and his right hand inside of his left breast; the parties were 100 feet apart at that time; both had on talmas or short cloaks; Casey approached rapidly, asking in a sharp, excited voice, "Are you armed?" immediately following, he said, "Defend yourself," or "prepare to defend yourself"; all this took place in a few seconds; Mr. King made no reply that I heard; as Casey said, "Defend yourself," he let his talma fall and raised his right arm, which held a revolver, which must have been cocked at the time cloak fell, and he immediately fired at Mr. King; whilst Mr. Casey was in the act of firing, Mr. King turned his face slightly towards the west, shoving his arm down in his vest—rather in a defensive position; the ball struck King on the left breast and shoulder, when he cried out, "O Lord" several times, and walked to the Pacific Express office; he (King) observed Casey before the fire, but paid no attention to him whatever afterwards; on his way to the Express office, I heard him say, "Oh! my arm," several times; judged his arm was broken; Casey immediately after firming, threw his revolver across his knee and used both hands in cocking it; walked some steps forward in the direction of King, who was at this time passing obliquely into Express office and behind an express wagon; the act of passing into the Express office naturally placed King and Casey on either side of the express wagon; when Casey saw King going towards the Express office and in rather an opposite direction to himself, he stopped, hesitated, and after turning half-way round and looking about him, uncocked his pistol with both hands; picked up the cloak he had dropped; about the time he reached his cloak I saw two men approach him rapidly from the direction of the Express office, one of whom was Lafayette Byrne, the other man I had never seen before; I have never seen him since to my knowledge; seemed to be in the act of arresting him.

Mr. Foote objected to the examination.

"Do you know whether King publicly proclaimed his readiness for such rencounter as this?" (Ruled out.) "Was the action of Casey on this occasion that of a fair and honorable

Cook in Comfort

You no longer need wear yourself out with the weakening heat of an intensely hot kitchen. You can cook in comfort.

Here is a stove that gives no outside heat. All its heat is concentrated at the burners. An intense blue flame (hotter than either white or red) is thrown upwards but not around. All the heat is utilized in cooking — none in outside heating.

New Perfection
WICK BLUE FLAME

entirely removes the discomfort of cooking. Apply a match and immediately the stove is ready. Instantly an intense heat is projected upwards against the pot, pan, kettle or boiler, and yet there is no surrounding heat — no smell — no smoke.

Cautionary Note: Be sure you get this stove—see that the name-plate reads "New Perfection."

Why? Because The New Perfection Oil Cook-Stove is scientifically and practically perfect. You cannot use too much wick—it is automatically controlled. You get the maximum heat—no smoke. The burner is simple. One wipe with a cloth cleans it—consequently there is no smell.

The New Perfection Oil Cook-Stove is wonderful for year-round use, but especially in summer. Its heat operates upward to pan, pot, or kettle, but not beyond or around. It is useless for heating a room.

It has a Cabinet Top with shelf for keeping plates and food hot.

It has long turquoise-blue enamel chimneys. The nickel finish, with the bright blue of the chimneys, makes the stove ornamental and attractive. Made with 1, 2 and 3 burners; the 2 and 3-burner stoves can be had with or without Cabinet.

combatant?" (Ruled out.) "What is the difference in size of these two persons?" (Objected to.)

Mr. Botts contended for the propriety of the question; is it not legal to urge this question; I expect to prove that Mr. Casey was at that time smarting under an insult not improperly resented by a rencounter of this kind.

Mr. Foote contended that unless he (the defendant) proved the offensive position of King, the question was out of order. I say, so far as I am concerned, if the gentleman really wishes to show an insult complained of, we have no objection; I deny that Casey was ever wronged by King, or that King ever did anything but what was justly demanded of him, as an editor, by the public. Question admitted.

Casey was a small man in stature; suppose he might weigh 125 or 135 pounds; muscular for his size, and active; King was 6 feet high, I should suppose; weighing, I should judge, 190 pounds at least, with rather an uncommon degree of muscular strength and power.

Cross-examined—Did not know King was sick; would say he weighed 170 or 180 when well; don't know that Whiteman conducted Casey off; had started to the American Exchange to get a drink; recognized Mr. Andrew Hebon, a butcher; no recollection of seeing any one else until immediately after the firing; saw after, Ex-Mayor Webb, Wm. Neely Johnson, Richard Sinton, A. M. Smith and most of my acquaintances on Montgomery street; think I saw Ham. Bowie in the crowd—not positive.

To Mr. Botts—Know Dan's Saloon; knew it in May, '56; went in frequently to take a drink.

"Ever see lager beer there?" Objected to.

Question allowed.

Feel no modesty; had intimate acquaintance with brandy-cocktails; have seen hundred or five thousand persons drink there; popular bar—generally full; first class saloons never keep lager beer.

Gov. Foote—"Was it not distinguished for a fighting place?"

Politics made up there; judge it respectable from the number of respectable gentlemen who want to mix in. (Laughter.) McGowan drank there; don't know that lager beer was not kept there; universally not kept in that class of saloons; there are drinking saloons in San Francisco where lager beer is not kept on the highest price; cheaper than best liquor; sold sometimes above ground.

John Nugent, was called and sworn—Was police officer in San Francisco last 14th of May, 1856; saw defendant (McGowan) on that day, about five o'clock, on Washington street, about five doors from Kearny; wanted to see him; went across to the north side of the street, to see him; was in his company about ten minutes; went to Kearny street together; did not see Hamilton Bowie; McGowan spoke to some one who was with him; saw a buggy near to Palmer, Cook & Co's; did not hear the report of a pistol; the rencounter took place whilst I was with McGowan; left McGowan on Kearny street, fifteen steps from Washington.

Cross-examined—Am special police officer; no person in company with McGowan when I saw him; I was standing in Dunbar's alley when I saw him; McGowan was with Stevenson and Green; no one else with me; standing at corner of alley and Washington street; did not look at the clock; knew the time by hearsay; McGowan was walking towards Kearny street; accompanied him eight doors on Washington; went ten or fifteen steps down Kearny street; heard that there was a man shot, while standing there on Kearny street; don't know who told me that a man had been shot; Stevenson, I think, told me; he was an officer; McGowan was standing by me when the communication was given me; left McGowan in Kearny street; can't say which way he went; I ran down to Dunbar's alley; judge I walked with McGowan some ten minutes; did not see any one I knew while standing with McGowan; my business with him was to get him to see a man for me; don't know how long ago it was I let McGowan know of this matter—while he was in Sacramento; spoke of it to some of his friends in San Francisco.

After argument the jury as instructed by Judge McKinstry and after ten minutes' deliberation returned a verdict of acquittal.

Conclusion

As I have now reached the end of my narrative, before bidding farewell to the reader, I will dispose of some of the leading characters who figured in my adventures in the lower country. The woman, whose house sheltered me while I was wrapped in the carpet at Santa Barbara, I have never since seen. I learned, however, before I left that county, that her husband was in the State prison, where he had been sentenced for loaning his gun to another person who killed a man with it. The poor fellow who was thus implicated in the crime was ignorant of the intention of the borrower. In gratitude for the good offices of his wife, when I was so sorely in need of a friend, I interested myself with some of my influential friends at the capital and elsewhere, to have the case fully represented to the Governor, and not long since had the pleasure to see the Executive clemency interposed and the man restored to the arms of his good wife.

As to Jack Power, to whose courage and fidelity I unquestionably owe my life, words can never express the gratitude I feel for him. If, in the course of this story I have alluded to transgressions with which he was charged, I have not done so from any belief of his guilt, but simply to show how unlikely it is that one who had acted so generously and honorably to a persecuted stranger should be guilty of such offences as some of his enemies have hinted against him.

Pedro, who tried to sell me to my enemies when I was placing confidence in his promises of friendship, I forgive. I never desire, however, to see him, for I would fain spare him the mortification of looking upon my face. As to his brave and faithful wife, the Senora, I live in the hope that some day it may be in my power to evince my gratitude to her and her children, and apologize for the hasty departure I took from her hospitable protection.

Good Doctor Den and his family I hope soon to take again by the hands and renew my thousand thanks for their generous friendship in my hour of peril.

And now, in bidding the reader farewell, let me say to him, that, if he has done me the honor to follow me through the preceding pages, I thank him for the compliment, and assure him that I attribute his patience more to the interest with which my story has invested a principle, than to any intrinsic merit which the book itself may possess. If, perchance, he has honestly differed with me in his opinions as to the "Vigilance Committee," so long as he has acted conscientiously, and been more the instrument than the director in the unhappy proceedings of that organization, I have in my heart no room for malice against him, but I sincerely hope that, in the future, the lesson of the last year will be to him something of a guide should his strength of mind again be similarly tested. For him my story is told. But there are others for whom I have not yet laid down my pen. A task less pleasing than that which I have just accomplished is now before me. If the simplicity and truthfulness with which I have sought to characterize this little story of my wrongs is any guarantee that what may come from me hereafter will be reliable, I have the satisfaction of knowing that I have perhaps prepared the public mind, calmly and dispassionately, to reason with me when I shall attempt the task of removing the specious tissue which veils the hideousness of treason and temporarily prevents the putrescence of hypocrisy from offending the senses.

Unpleasant as is this task, I shall not shrink from it. In accordance with the views which first prompted me to intrude myself upon the notice of the public at all, I shall, in discharge of a duty which I still think may result usefully to my fellow citizens, make it my special business to show the honest men who have thoughtlessly embarked on the tide of conspiracy, how miserably they have taken the chances of moral and social wreck at the hands of the pilots to whom they have entrusted themselves.

With regard to the success of this volume I can only await anxiously the verdict of the public. With all its imperfections—its inaccuracies of expression—its manifold marks of haste and, sometimes I fear, of carelessness, it must go forth to the world, to sink or swim, upon its own merits. If the press of California but give this little waif upon the stream of literature a fair consideration, I am not without hope that, after every just censure shall have been passed upon its demerits, enough of approbation may be expressed to comfort its author with the reflection that his labor has not been all in vain.

There is, however, one press in this State, and only one, whose commendations would strike painfully upon my ear. Were any emanation from my pen to receive the encomiums of the San Francisco Evening Bulletin, I should feel that I had indeed most signally failed in the honest object of this book, and that it was justly a target for the most envenomed shafts of criticism.

The plaudits of one who has made personal infamy a stepping stone to rebellion, who has thrown around craven cowardice a halo of glory, who has gilded slander with the sunbeams of justice, and invested hypocrisy with the attributes of religion, are not coveted by me. Let him rather open to their widest extent the sluice gates of his filth, and vomit forth his disgusting spleen, lest with the retention of it he should not only damn this book, but, bursting himself, engender a moral pestilence in the land.

To the rest of the press of California, I commend my book, trusting and believing, that if it is thought worthy of notice at all, it will receive fair consideration, and to the reader, who has honored me thus far, I repeat my thanks, and bid him an affectionate farewell

Auto Notes

S. G. Chapman has received from Portland, Ore., details of the operation of a Hupmobile by a man who has only one arm. This individual recently made a trip of 158 miles in 8½ hours, using seven gallons of gasoline and driving one-third of the distance on low gear because of steep hills and bad roads. He has had the car three months and in that time has driven it 4,000 miles.

Two Diamond Tires, one of which has run 27,000 miles and the other 25,000 miles, are certified to in an affidavit by Allen R. Kennedy of San Jose. Mr. Allen R. Kennedy is the owner of a Model "K" 1898 White Steamer which weighs about 4,000 pounds. The Diamond Tires were part of the original equipment of the car and have been in constant use ever since.

Another motor truck success has been achieved, this time on the mountain grades of Madera and the nearby counties. The machine was a White three-ton truck and was driven to Madera by Frank Davis for delivery to a sugar pine lumbering concern in that vicinity. Never before probably was there a truck put to such a test and never such conclusive proof of the motor-driven vehicle's all-round fitness for every description of transfer work. The grades climbed ranged from 10 to 32 per cent and for a large part of the way had sand bottoms. The truck climbed 5,000 feet, making an ascent of 1,200 feet inside of three miles. The truck covered the distance from the railroad in nine hours whereas the horse-driven wagons give four days to the same distance.

Mr. E. P. Brinegar of the Pioneer Automobile Co. has received a letter from Mr. Hugh Chalmers of the Chalmers Motor Co. advising of the promotion of Mr. Lee Counselman, former sales manager, to general manager of the Chalmers Co. It also states that Mr. Hildebrand, formerly general sales manager of an eastern factory, succeeds Mr. Counselman with the title of assistant general manager. With these changes Mr. Chalmers believes that his organization is as nearly perfect as it is possible to make it. Mr. Hildebrand assumed his new duties on June 1 and it is expected that he will make a trip to the coast very shortly.

Messrs. Nash & Fennimore, agents for the Lozier cars at Los Angeles, are in communication with the Pioneer Automobile Co. trying to arrange for several cars out of the local firm's 1910 allotment. The Pioneer Automobile Co., however, is selling the cars as fast as they arrive and consequently will not be able to accommodate the southern agency.

F. A. Moskovics, builder and proprietor of the Los Angeles Motordrome, is a staunch advocate of Lozier superiority. Recently he offered the car this high recommendation: "I believe the Lozier frame to be stronger and larger than any other built. Very few prospective purchasers give a thought to the matter of frame construction and yet the frame is one of the vital features of a car."

The Chanslor & Lyon Motor Supply Company have just issued a catalogue which in size and comprehensiveness far exceeds anything of this kind before attempted by a local supply house. Among the supplies particularly featured are Hartford Tires, Harris Oils and Greases, Exide Storage Batteries, Shaler Vulcanizers, both Schebier and Stromberg Carburetors, Rushmore Lamps and various makes of wind shields and spark plugs.

Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Boardman and Mr. and Mrs. C. C. Zinns spent the week end at Santa Cruz. They made the trip in their Chalmers "40" going over the Santa Cruz Mountains and returning by way of Watsonville and Gilroy. They had a very delightful trip, the car giving perfect satisfaction in every respect.

The practical working out of aeroplanes has meant a new field for the rubber tire business. The local branch of the Diamond Rubber Company recently equipped Frank Johnson's Curtiss biplane with tires and also received orders from the Ames Tricycle Co. for twenty-five pairs of 20x2½ tires. These are to be used on wheels manufactured by this company for aeroplanes.

The Park Commissioners have for the last few weeks been quietly testing different makes of automobiles for use in directing their official duties and for Mr. McLaren, with the result that they have placed their order with the Pioneer Automobile Co. for one of their new model 6-40 Thomas five-passenger touring cars.

A carload each of Chalmers, Hudsons and Model "M" Thomas cars was shipped to the Fresno branch of the Pioneer Automobile Co. a few days ago.

In the big economy contest recently held under the auspices of the Chicago Motor Club in the Windy City the Hupmobile averaged 258 miles for each gallon of gasoline used. This was the greatest mileage made by any of the competing cars and is one of the many conclusive testimonials of Hupmobile economy. This Chicago test is one of the auto events that claims national attention and is held over a particularly hard route.

Monogram Oil has again proven its superiority as a racing car lubricant. Every machine that placed in the Good Roads Meet at Tanforan was using this oil.

H. E. Doty, Pacific Coast Manager of the White Company, is just in receipt of the following letter forwarded to him from J. W. Thomas of Nashville, Tenn.: "Have had three White Steamers, a 1905, 1906 and a 1907. Am still using the latter. If I were going to purchase a new car, it would be a 1910 White Steamer. I could say no more were I to write a week."

SUMMONS TO ESTABLISH TITLE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—Action No. 21,253.

DORA I. WALTON, Plaintiff, vs.
All Persons Claiming any Interest in, or Lien Upon, the Real Property Herein Described, or any Part Thereof, Defendants.

Action in rem brought against all the world in the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and the complaint filed in said City and County in the office of the Clerk of said Superior Court.

The People of the State of California: To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described, or any part thereof, defendants, Greeting.

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Dora I. Walton, the above-named plaintiff, filed with the Clerk of the above entitled Court and County, within three months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property, or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

Commencing at a point on the Easterly line of Douglas Street, distant thereon One Hundred and Fifteen (115) feet Northerly from the Northerly line of Twenty-third Street; running thence Northerly along the said Easterly line of Douglas Street Fifty (50) feet; thence at right angles Easterly One Hundred and Thirty-four (134) feet and Three (3) inches; thence at right angles Southerly Fifty (50) feet, and thence at right angles Westerly One Hundred and Thirty-four (134) feet and Three (3) inches to the point of commencement. Portion of Horner's Addition Block Number Two Hundred and Sixteen (216).

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: The judgment of this Court establishing plaintiff's title to said real property and determining all adverse claims thereto, and declaring plaintiff to be the owner in fee simple absolute of all the above described real property and each and every part thereof free and clear of any liens or encumbrances, and for general relief and costs of suit.

Witness my hand and the Seal of said Court this 28th day of April, A. D. 1910. H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.
(Seal) By JAS. P. KANE, Deputy Clerk.

SUMMONS TO ESTABLISH TITLE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—Action No. 21,163, Department No. 10.

ANNIE E. REYNOLDS, sometimes known as MRS. G. F. REYNOLDS, Plaintiff, vs.
All Persons Claiming Any Interest in, or Lien Upon, the Real Property Herein Described, or Any Part Thereof, Defendants.

The People of the State of California: To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of ANNIE E. REYNOLDS, sometimes known as MRS. G. F. REYNOLDS, plaintiff, filed with the clerk of the above entitled Court and City and County, within three (3) months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

PARCEL No. 2.—Commencing at a point on the Southerly line of Twenty-sixth (26th) Street, distant thereon One Hundred and Eighty-nine (189) feet Westerly from the Westerly line of Dolores Street, and running thence Westerly on said Southerly line of Twenty-sixth (26th) Street Twenty-five (25) feet; thence at a right angle Southerly One Hundred and Fourteen (114) feet; thence at a right angle Easterly Twenty-five (25) feet, and thence at a right angle Northerly One Hundred and Fourteen (114) feet to the point of beginning. Being a portion of Horner's Addition Block 59.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that the plaintiff is the owner of said property in fee simple absolute; that her title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consist of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiff recover her costs herein and have such other relief as may be meet in the premises.

Witness my hand and the seal of said Court this 23rd day of April, A. D. 1910. H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 29,295.

DOTTIE LILLIAN PARSONS, Plaintiff, vs.
EDWARD EUGENE PARSONS, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to Edward Eugene Parsons, Defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, on the ground of defendant's wilful desertion; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that , unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

Letters

Geraldine Bonner's Latest

Geraldine Bonner long ago earned her right to the title of novelist of the California Pioneer. She has written five stories dealing each with a different phase of the lives of early settlers and it would take a hair-splitting nicety of discrimination to decide that any one is better than the others. Hitherto she has given her attention to the emigrants and their families after having reached the State, but in "The Emigrant Trail" she goes back to the beginning of things, to the long journey across the plains by which the first of the Pioneers made their way to the shores of the Pacific. As the party whose fortunes we follow under her guidance set out in 1848 it will be seen that they antedated the "Gold Rush" by a full year. It was the excitement over Marshall's discovery that precipitated the stampede during which poorly equipped trains often made up of undesirable elements struck out to win through by main strength and awkwardness, and it was the inconsiderate and often idiotic behavior of these which was the main cause of the Indian attacks as well as of the shortage of natural food and feed, so, in "The Emigrant Trail" the reader will be spared many of the stock features and harrowing descriptions of starvation, cholera epidemics, massacres and outlawry. These earlier travelers were usually staid and sober citizens who duly considered the details of the enterprise and were not led on by glowing descriptions of rich "diggin's" and a chance to make a fortune in a short while and return to "the States" to enjoy it. Early in 1848, then, two young men camped at Independence, Missouri, and about to start across the plains with a well equipped wagon, saddle horses and several thousand dollars in coin, were joined by a second party consisting of a New York physician in ill health, his daughter and their hired man, an old frontiersman. The Gillespies had meant to unite with a larger party but delays in their own progress had held them back until it was too late, and now finding themselves alone, the arrangement being agreeable to both, they joined with Leffingwell and Crystal. These early trains, as Miss Bonner points out, were not without law but they carried their own laws with them, made regulations growing out of the exigencies of the situation and were a community unto themselves. It almost goes without saying that before long David Crystal had fallen in love with Susan Gillespie, propinquity having as much to do with it as attraction, for the reader will find little in common between them. David was an admirable and amiable young man and Dr. Gillespie was more than pleased with the prospect. The narrative of the journey is given with minute completeness. It might easily be the actual experience of some band of emigrants, a history of their progress and the incidents of the road, the meetings with other trains, with Mormons, Indians, trappers and returning travelers, the friendships quickly made and as soon severed, the affairs of birth and death, accidents, defections and losses, but most interesting is the effect of the journey on the members of the party, the bringing out of primitive characteristics hidden in civilized surroundings and the gradual dropping of acquired manners, just as they are obliged to discard superfluities and travel light for the sake of speed and sparing their animals, and the new point of view which the conventionalized women are obliged to adopt. At one point in their progress the Gillespie-Crystal party is joined by two new men, one a Rocky Mountain trapper and the other a half-breed Crow. At first the men are repugnant to Susan Gillespie and her friend Lucy, who has joined them from another party, but before long Lucy, who has become a common drudge to her sister's family, finds in Zavier the only one who gives her a pleasant word or lightens her labor, and there is little to be surprised at when, in the fastnesses of the mountains, she elopes with him. The other trapper Low Courant, as he gives his name, treats Susan with small courtesy. Indeed he makes no account of considering the women an unnecessary burden to the outfit, but after the good doctor's death, when the real hardships of the journey begin, and David Crystal proves unequal to the strain, giving way when even Susan bears up, she begins to look upon Courant in a different light and to see that he is at his best in those surroundings, and despite her promise to David and the understanding which lightened the doctor's last hours, she breaks her engagement with him and makes a new compact with the mountaineer. The manner in which David was lost from the party, his subsequent fate and the remorse which seized upon Courant when, after his marriage with Susan and their settlement within civilized bounds, he feels his old wild outlook slipping from him, is sympathetically given. Indeed one of the strongest points to be made in praise of Miss Bonner's work is the sympathy and understanding which she displays. She sees, as no other author seems to, the point of view of the Californian. Any one of the five novels she has written might be biographical and there is no old-timer or long resident who cannot name some one amongst his own acquaintances who might have sat for her portraits. Her Pioneers are types and her incidents typical. It will never be said of her as it was of Bret Harte that the best thing that could happen to California would be his annihilation. Coming on the eve of the celebration of the sixtieth anniversary of the Admission of California, "The Emigrant Trail" is a timely book and there is not one line too much in all its five hundred pages. The attractive volume is sponsored by the Duffield Co.

Kiss of Purity

"Is the room disinfected?"

"Yes, mother; and I have sterilized the curtains, deodorized the furniture, fumigated all the fixtures, vaporized the air, washed my lips in an antiseptic solution, and—"

"Have you septicized the ornaments?"

"Thoroughly, mother; everything is done. Arthur is waiting now in the hydrogen room."

"Then you may go in and let him kiss you, dear."

A Sex Problem Solved

A woman missionary in China was taking tea with a mandarin's eight wives.

"Why," one cried, "you can walk and run as well as a man!"

"Yes, to be sure," said the missionary.

"Can you ride a horse and swim, too?"

"Yes."

"Then you must be as strong as a man!"

"I am."

"And you wouldn't let a man beat you—not even if he was your husband—would you?"

"Indeed I wouldn't!" said the missionary.

The mandarin's eight wives looked at one another, nodding their heads. Then the oldest said, softly: "Now, I understand why the foreign devil never has more than one wife. He is afraid."

"That young man looks very intelligent."

"Yes, he's a member of our magazine staff."

"What are his duties?"

"He hitches well-known anecdotes to unknown celebrities."

"Pa, what are wall-flowers?"

"Pinks of propriety, my son."

World's 24-Hour Stock Car Record 1196 Miles

LOZIER

The LOZIER still holds the world's 24-hour Stock Car competition record of 1196 miles made at Brighton Beach in October, 1909

¶ Notwithstanding the fact that the recent 24-hour race was not held under Stock Car rules (contestants being permitted to race with any size, style or horsepower of car, or to make any changes, additions and alterations in Stock Cars at will), the LOZIER Stock Car record of 1196 miles still remains unbroken.

¶ In the LOZIER record-breaking race of October, 1909, the winning LOZIER made 1196 miles, and another LOZIER car finished in second place, making 1169 miles. The winner of the recent 24-hour race made only 1145 miles, and therefore failed to reach the mileage attained by either of the LOZIER cars in the great 24-hour LOZIER Record Race of last year.

¶ In the great Brighton Beach Race, September, 1908, LOZIER cars also finished first and second, both exceeding previous world's records. These two great double LOZIER victories of 1908 and 1909 have no parallel in the history of automobile racing.

¶ LOZIER Stock Cars have seven times defeated previous 24-hour World's Records---no other car more than once. The LOZIER car has broken more 24-hour records and defeated more famous cars in long distance events than any other car in the world, and today its claim of being the greatest long distance Stock Car in the world remains undisputed.

Hearst and Roosevelt

Who that likes to view things with the eye of history and philosophy, divested of passion and interest, can fail to find entertainment in the Hon. William R. Hearst's ferocious assaults on Colonel Roosevelt? Everybody who apprehends instinctively the mechanism behind the scenes of the world's stage realizes that there is much that is worthy of philosophic study in the pregnant situation that has arisen in the current drama of American politics. The protagonists of this dramatic episode are figures of colossal stature. One is the maker of an epoch in his country's history, a man upon whom the eyes of the world are focussed, an object of universal interest; the other, his rival in a contest for the affections of a powerful people, himself a man of prodigious influence having the means of swaying the passions and judgment of millions of human beings. This appears to be a titanic contest. But we are not to be convinced that the outcome will prove as momentous as any of the decisive battles of the world's history. The probable outcome is not a matter upon which we care to speculate. We know that all the great changes in government, all the great epochs in history had their origin in phenomena that appeared to be insignificant and inconsequential, but we have not the patience to scrutinize the seeds of time with a view to ascertaining what is to be the effect of the present tremendous clash of the most potent of our contemporary personalities. We find it more to our taste to sit in the gallery, study the performance and comment on the passing show.

Smashing an Idol

The first emotion induced by the performance is that of merriment. It is highly amusing to listen to Mr. Hearst's argument in justification of his recantation with respect to the Colonel. Mr. Hearst would have us believe that he never penetrated the Roosevelt mask until the Colonel landed in England. Yet his severest strictures on the ex-President are for high crimes and misdemeanors committed in the tempestuous days when the Roosevelt obsession was prevalent throughout the land. In the catalogue of the Colonel's transgressions which Mr. Hearst has prepared for public consumption we find recorded the episode of the two "practical men." That episode is one of the ugliest counts in an indictment which has long been hanging over our ex-President's head, an indictment to which there has been no plea. Surely Mr. Hearst has not been in ignorance of the Colonel's relations with E. H. Harriman. Those relations were a matter of common knowledge months before Mr. Hearst paid a certain memorable visit to the White House to grasp the hand of a gigantic public idol. And somewhat older than the episode of the two practical men is the delusion regarding the Colonel's performances as a military man. Yet Mr. Hearst would have us believe that but yesterday he learned of the Colonel's plight on Kettle Hill and of the misleading character of the halo which he has been wearing since the battle of San Juan where he figured neither as a man of valor nor as a soldier of discretion. So also would Mr. Hearst have us believe that hitherto he has been unaware of the Colonel's activity as an iconoclast in literature. He tells us of his puerile and pedantic criticisms of such men as Jackson and Jefferson, and holds him up to reprobation for thus seeking to lower in popular esteem some of the most revered names in the annals of American history. Why did Mr. Hearst wait so long to tell the truth about Colonel Roosevelt? Is he telling it now because he thinks the psychological moment has arrived for the smashing of the idol of the masses? We suspect that the distinguished journalist is at his old trick of trimming his sails to the breeze of popular opinion. Nevertheless more power to his elbow. For the obsession has not altogether relaxed. The Colonel has been riding to a fall, but he is far from down and out. If Mr. Hearst hastens the happy consummation we shall be able to forgive him the part that he played in the building of the idol that he is now intent upon demolishing.

The Motive and the Man

Men are speculating as to Mr. Hearst's motive in attacking Colonel Roosevelt. In connection with Mr. Hearst's activities there is always curiosity respecting the motive. Not generally regarded as an incorruptibly wise and fearlessly benevolent journalist, the suspicion is prevalent that he is in the habit of judging and acting as his own personal fears and interests may dictate. And in this instance the thought has suggested itself that he is looking ahead to the next national campaign, fondly hoping to be a candidate for President and deeming it advisable therefore to destroy the monster in whose creation he assisted in the days when a Roosevelt seemed to be the most effective means of stimulating class hatred. This may be the truth of the matter. But why concern ourselves about motives when we are getting so much entertainment out of the passing show. Mr. Hearst is winding the mighty machine of public opinion. Let us watch him with philosophic interest. Let us observe the gradual disillusioning of that incredible beast the omnipotent public. There may be some of us of the opinion that Mr. Hearst ought to be beating his breast in penitence instead of fuming ferociously at his darling hero in buckram, but we must never lose patience with him. Whatever his eccentricities and his shams, however transparent his insincerity, his power must command our respect if not our admiration. And the exercise of that power is always an interesting and instructive study. One day he is employed in building up an absurdity, the next exhausting his wit and zeal and fury in battering it down. How interesting and instructive to note that with equal facility he can fire or build the Ephesian dome of public opinion. In former days, somebody has said, superstitious rites were used to exorcise evil spirits, but in our times the same object is attained and beyond comparison more effectually by the common newspaper. How well this is being illustrated by Mr. Hearst and the other noble editors to whom Colonel Roosevelt has ceased to be a hero! True the Colonel has not altogether lost his hold on the public imagination. He was greeted with enthusiasm on his spectacular return from Europe, which was celebrated strictly in accordance with the arrangements of his band of worshippers who claim and foster him as an asset, but now that his follies are being exploited as well as his impressive fustiana there is small likelihood of his being able to maintain his equilibrium on his feet of clay.

Herrin and His Critics

The learned editors of our parochial dailies have had something to say about Mr. William F. Herrin's Oregon address. What they have said is worth reading for the light that it throws on the mental processes of the leaders of public thought in this community. Dissenting from Mr. Herrin's views, as was to be expected, our tripod philosophers make no attempt to discuss the principles of government which Mr. Herrin enunciated; they advance no argument in refutation of his propositions; they challenge not a single assertion, preferring either to make him the target of personal abuse or to dogmatize and moralize in the old familiar vein congenial to cant and nonsense. The Bulletin, for example, lightly dismisses the proposition that it is better for the people to be guided by their sober, second conscience than by their hasty judgment formed in the heat of passion. As inflaming the mob is the Bulletin's forte it insists that public clamor is the voice of God and that conservative opinion has always stood in the path of progress. The Examiner, oracular as usual, lays down a proposition and lets it go at that. The Examiner's proposition is that as the Southern Pacific Company dominates politics in California the people should adopt any old short-cut to popular despotism regardless of consequences. In the Examiner's philosophy it doesn't matter if the cure be worse than the malady. The Call is similarly minded. But the Call is critical and takes Mr. Herrin to task for not clearly defining the distinction between public clamor and public opinion and for not showing how democracy is inconsistent with honest representative government. Both the Call and the Examiner defend the recall, the former journal affirming it to be "closely representative of the popular will," the Examiner holding that as it weakens the power of the octopus it requires no other recommendation. From all that has been said on the subject it is clear that the fundamentals of our government and the principles of the theory upon which it has been formed are but faintly apprehended in our parochial newspaper offices. We suspect that Mr. Herrin deliberately played a joke on our learned editors; that knowing they would scoff at anything he said, he carefully refrained from saying anything that was not elemental or that had not been embodied either in policies advocated by the most illustrious of our early patriots or the maxims of the world's greatest authorities on the science of government. His warning against innovations, for example, is one of the warnings to be found in Washington's Farewell Address. His views with regard to the danger of going to extremes in democracy are not at variance with those of Thomas Jefferson. What he said about the popular short-cuts that are designed to simplify our system of government that the popular will may be more frequently and easily expressed, is in line with what Daniel Webster said: "Nothing is more dangerous or more deceptive than the pretence of a desire to simplify government. The simplest governments are despotisms. If we abolish the distinction of the branches of a government we may readily simplify; we may readily bring it to the simplest of all forms a pure despotism." On the subject of the recall Mr. Herrin might have quoted Edmund Burke: "They are the distempers of elections that have destroyed all free States. To cure these distempers is difficult if not impossible; the only thing left therefore to save the commonwealth is to prevent their return too quickly."

Our Government and Our Innovations

The main point of the Herrin address is that certain innovations on our system of politics designed to augment the power of the masses and accelerate the expression of popular will are inconsistent with the principles of our representative form of government. Now this is a proposition about which there can be no dispute, the only question presenting itself being the question of the advisability of abandoning our principles of government on account of some of its imperfections. It certainly cannot be disputed that in electing United States Senators by direct vote of the people we are simplifying our government and violating one of its fundamental principles. The founders of this republic, as everyone familiar with their deliberations is aware, deemed it advisable to have two separate and distinct branches of the legislature, one directly responsive to the will of the people and the other inaccessible in a measure to public clamor. They made the exercise of the legislative power by two distinct and independent branches a fundamental rule, thus adopting a principle which they were taught by the experience of nations to regard as essential to the stability of the nation. Although Mr. Herrin did not touch on this subject assuredly he had it in mind when he spoke of the innovations that tend to destroy the character of our representative form of government. The direct primary when employed for the election of United States Senators is one of the devices that are conclusive of a tendency on the part of the people under the guidance of demagogues to convert our government into the market democracy of antiquity. The recall is another of these devices. The recall is grounded in the theory that there is only one principle of government, the principle of the divinity of Democratic Might. As the Call says "it is closely representative of the popular will," but it was never intended that the popular will should operate as a species of terror throughout our system of government. The aim of our representative form of government is to give equal rights to all—to the minority as well as to the majority—not to facilitate the despotism either of the majority or of a class. The people are expected to choose for their servants the most instructed and the ablest persons who can be found, and to permit them to exercise their best judgment during a limited period under the check of the freest discussion and the most unreserved censure, but with the least possible interference. This system of government was invented that the omnipotence of the majority might be exercised through an enlightened agency accountable to the people in the last resort. It was invented as a bar against absolutism of the executive on the one hand and of the masses on the other. It is a government of trusteeship, and it is supposed to be the only means by which the rashness and blind zeal of the masses can be tempered in a democracy. Statesmen and philosophers who have approved this form of government knew that it would not approximate perfection. Yet they supposed that the only danger to be apprehended under it was that the restraints of the institutional character which it takes might come to be regarded as fetters, and that the people becoming insensible of the paramount necessity of being governed might concern themselves only with governing. This is precisely the significance of the phenomena against which Mr. Herrin has uttered his warning. The whole burden of demagogic preachment these days is that as the people are supreme they should avail themselves of their supremacy, do whatever they will regardless of whether they may will to do more than is for their ultimate interest. This is what Mr. Herrin has pointed out. And although it is unquestionably to the interest of the corporation which he represents to give the people pause and have them understand the dangers of a market democracy, it is none the less to the interest of the people to appreciate the facts that he sought to impress on his audience.

Elegiac Verses

So she is dead, and somewhere in the sky
  A star is shrouded till her soul has passed
  The second sphere of woe. I heard the last Vague ghostly trailing of her robes go by,
And heard the burdened brooding threnody
  Sob out its sombre sorrow in the waste
And barren place of tombs where she doth lie,
And let Earth take her own without a cry.

Nor even now the anguish overflows
  In easy floods of tributary tears.
  I only feel a burden as of years
Laid on a weary heart that seems to close
Against the frozen blood. The darting throes
  Of pain, the storming throng of thrilling fears,
Have wrung no nerve to feeling. A repose
That mimics death o'er all my being grows.

I know that Death was kind. He must have smiled,
  And turned the mask of doom to promise fair
  And twined the myrtle leaves within his hair
And called himself young Love, ere he beguiled
Her lively soul to follow to the wild,
  And brighten with her presence his dull lair.
He knew the lure to lead her like a child
To stranger ways by mortals undefiled.

I cannot think she sighed, or suffered pain,
  So gently did the spirit cut the cord,
  The golden band that wedded Life the Lord
To flesh so humbly beautiful. A strain
Of hidden music touched her with a fain
  And fervent strength, and as she heard the chord
A smile lay lightly on her lips again,
And Death forbade it not there to remain.

The Broderick-Terry Duel

(Owing to the interest which has been excited by the publication in Town Talk of the Narrative of Ned McGowan it is the intention to publish other Californiana not readily accessible to the general public. This account of the duel between Broderick and Terry is taken with some changes from Major Ben C. Truman's interesting volume, "The Field of Honor" where it is credited to a San Francisco correspondent of the New York Sun who wrote in 1882.—Editor's Note.)

Among the many duels in the early days of California none excited so much interest, and none had such an influence on politics and society, as the fatal meeting between David C. Broderick and David S. Terry. They were representative men. One was a United States Senator, and the other Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of California. They were filling important niches in the history of the young State. No such political antagonism had existed since the days of Burr and Hamilton. The Republican Party was a healthy infant, and growing rapidly. The State was controlled by a two-winged Democracy. Gwin, Terry, Ashe, Brooks, Benham, and others worked the Lecompton wing, and Broderick, the friend of Stephen A. Douglas and an ardent opponent of the extension of slavery, was the soul of the anti-Lecompton wing. He and his followers occupied middle ground between nascent Republicanism and the Southern slave-Democracy. The friends of the Administration cherished a deep hatred for Broderick. With him out of the way, they might reunite the party on the old basis and control it. Broderick and his friends had thwarted the ambition of the "chivalry." After a desperate struggle he had secured a seat in the United States Senate, and had brought the haughty Gwin to terms. To retain his own seat in that body, Gwin had given the stonecutter a document pledging himself not to meddle with the official patronage of the Pacific Coast. This document was known as the "scarlet letter." Broderick had said in a speech that its writer ought to be as clearly marked for political ostracism as Hester Prynne was socially marked by the initial on her breast. It was a fatal letter. Politicians said that the man who had it in his possession was doomed.

The immediate cause of the quarrel grew out of a speech made by Judge Terry before the Lecompton Democratic State Convention in Sacramento in 1859. He called Broderick an arch-traitor. He said:

"They (the anti-Lecomptonites) are the followers of one man, the personal chattels of a single individual whom they are ashamed of. They belong, heart, soul, body, and breeches, to David C. Broderick. They are yet ashamed to acknowledge their master, and are calling themselves, aye, forsooth, Douglas Democrats, when it is known, well known to them as to us, that the gallant Senator from Illinois, whose voice has always been heard in the advocacy of Democratic principles, who now is not disunited from the Democratic Party, has no affiliation with them, no feeling in common with them. Mr. President and gentlemen, I am mistaken in denying their right to claim Douglas as a leader. Perhaps they do sail under the flag of Douglas; but it is the banner of the Black Douglas, whose name is Frederick, not Stephen."

Broderick read this speech while at breakfast in the International Hotel, and grimly smiled. "I see," he remarked to D. W. Perley, a lawyer (born in Woodstock, N. B., and a friend of the Gwin faction) "that Terry has been abusing me. I now take back the remark that I once made that he is the only honest judge on the Supreme bench. I was his friend when he was in need of friends, for which I am sorry. Had the Vigilance Committee disposed of him as they did of others, they would have done a righteous act."

He alluded to Terry's arrest by the Vigilantes in August, 1856, charged with cutting a man named Sterling A. Hopkins, in the attempt to free from arrest Reuben Maloney. Had Hopkins died, Terry would probably have hanged. As it was, it took the strongest influence, Masonic, press, and other, to save him from banishment.

Perley resented Broderick's remark. He professed to be a warm friend of Judge Terry, and even went so far as to challenge the Senator on his own account. His challenge was curtly declined with the contemptuous remark, "Sir, I fight only with gentlemen of my own position." Perley hurried off to Terry and repeated Broderick's slighting remarks. The spark did not need fanning. It was already alight. The Judge wrote a letter of inquiry, to which Broderick returned the following reply:

"Friday Evening, September 9, 1859.

"Hon. D. S. Terry: Yours of this date has been received. The remarks made by me were occasioned by certain offensive allusions of yours concerning me, made in the Convention at Sacramento, and reported in the Union of the 25th of June. Upon the topic alluded to in your note of this date, my language, so far as my recollection serves me, was as follows: 'During Judge Terry's incarceration by the Vigilance Committee I paid two hundred dollars a week to support a newspaper in his (your) defence. I have also stated heretofore that I considered him (Judge Terry) the only honest man on the Supreme bench. But I take it all back.' You are the proper judge as to whether this language affords good ground for offence.

"I remain, etc.,

D. C. Broderick."

Judge Terry considered the Senator's remarks "fighting talk," and there was a resort to the code. Calhoun Benham, a lawyer, S. H. Brooks (State Comptroller at the time), and Thomas Hayes attended to his interest, and Joseph C. McKibben, David D. Colton, and Leonidas Haskell acted for Senator Broderick. As to the niceties of affairs of honor, the gentlemen who assisted Terry were much superior to Broderick's friends. McKibben was a Congressman, and probably had never before participated in a formal duel. D. D. Colton had been sheriff of Siskiyou and the hero of many rough-and-tumble fights incident to his office in those lawless days. Haskell was an every-day man, who dabbled in politics without neglecting his business. Benham, Brooks, and Hayes, on the contrary, had figured repeatedly on the field, the latter as principal on one or two occasions. Mr. Broderick was somewhat surprised at the action of Mr. Hayes. They had been warm political friends in New York, and measurably so in California. Both were of Irish extraction.

A meeting had been arranged for the 12th of September, at sunrise, near the boundary-lines of San Mateo and San Francisco counties. The principals and their friends were all on the ground, when the chief of police, Martin J. Burke, placed them under arrest. They were brought before Police Justice H. P. Coon, and discharged on the ground that there had been no actual misdemeanor.

John A. McGlynn, a brother of a well-known Roman Catholic clergyman in New York; Andrew J. Butler, a brother of General B. F. Butler; and other friends of Broderick, had tried to dissuade him from fighting. He had listened to all their arguments, and had replied that his mind was made up—the duel could not be avoided with honor. He was quiet and composed, but inflexible.

It was thought that the arrest would stop further proceedings, but the principals were determined to have it out. The fact that a second meeting was to take place on the following morning was whispered to a few reporters under a promise of secrecy, and at midnight several

A Misfortune

By Anton Chekhov (From the Russian)

Sophie Petrovna, wife of the notary Loobyantsev, a handsome young woman of about twenty-five, and her neighbor, the advocate Elyin, occupying the next cottage, walked silently side by side down the forest path. It was five o'clock in the afternoon. White, fluffy clouds hung in the heavens; here and there from under them patches of pale blue sky were visible; the clouds remained motionless, looking as if they had been caught and held in position by the tall old pines. The air was still close.

In the distance the vista opened upon a small railroad embankment, on which just then for some reason or other a sentinel, gun in hand, marched up and down. Further on, on the other side of the embankment, glistened the large, white, six-towered church with its rust-covered roof.

"I didn't expect to meet you here," Sophie Petrovna was saying, as with eyes bent on the ground she idly stirred last year's leaves with the end of her dainty parasol; "but I am glad now that I did. I must speak with you seriously and finally. I beg of you, John Michaelovich, if you really care for me and respect me, give up pursuing me everywhere I go. You follow me about like a shadow, always look at me in that horrid manner, write strange letters, make love to me, and—and I should like to know when all this will end! What will it all lead to, in heaven's name!"

Elyin was silent. Sophie Petrovna took a few more steps and continued:

"And this sudden change in you has taken place only within the last two or three weeks, after a five years' friendship. I don't recognize you, John Michaelovich."

Sophie Petrovna stole a sidelong glance at her companion. With blinking eyes he was attentively watching the fluffy clouds. The expression on his face was sullen, angry and preoccupied. He looked like a man who suffered deeply, realizing all the while that he was listening to nonsense, but compelled to listen to it none the less.

"I am surprised that you do not realize it yourself," continued Mme. Loobyantsev with a slight shrug. "You must surely understand that it is not a very pretty game you are starting. I am a married woman, I love and respect my husband. I have a daughter—surely you do not count all this as nothing? Besides, you, as my old friend, know perfectly well my views upon family ties, upon the foundations of family relations in general—"

Elyin emitted a short, rasping sound of irritation and sighed. "Family relations," he muttered. "Oh, my God!"

"Yes, yes. I love my husband, I respect him, and at any rate I value the peace of my family. I would sooner allow myself to be killed than to be the cause of Andrew's and his daughter's misfortune. And so I beg of you, John Michaelovich, for God's sake, leave me in peace. Let us remain as we have been—good, kind friends; and do leave off those sighs and groans that are so unbecoming to you. There, that's settled and finished; not a word more about it! Let's talk of something else."

Sophie Petrovna stole another sidelong glance at Elyin's face. He was gazing upward; his face was pale and he was angrily biting his trembling lips. Mme. Loobyantsev could not understand why he was angry nor what he was rebelling against, but his pallor touched her.

"Don't be angry. Please let's be friends," she said kindly. "Agreed? There's my hand."

Elyin took the plump little hand in both of his, pressed it and slowly carried it to his lips.

"I am not a schoolboy," he muttered, "and the prospect of a friendship with the woman I love has no attraction for me."

"There, there, it's all settled and finished! Here, we have reached the bench; let's sit down."

The heart of Sophie Petrovna was filled with peace. The most difficult, the most awkward part of her task was over; the tormenting problem was solved. Now she could breathe freely and look Elyin straight in the face. She did look at him, and a little feeling of pure egotism—the woman's consciousness of power over the man who loves her—caressed her gently. It pleased her that this big, strong man, with his rugged, angry face—intelligent, well educated, one might say gifted—that this man, at her command, sat down beside her without saying a word and hung his head. For two or three minutes they remained silent.

"Nothing has yet been settled or finished," began Elyin. "I am quite familiar with your copy-book texts: 'I love and respect my husband'—'family relation!' All this I know without your telling me, and I go still further: I tell you honestly and sincerely that I consider my behavior scandalous and criminal. What more do you want? But why go on repeating things that are perfectly clear to everyone? Instead of feeding the poor nightingale with useless words, suppose you teach me what to do?"

"I have already told you—go away!"

"I have already—you know it perfectly well—gone away five times and each time returned before I had reached my destination. I can show you my railroad tickets—I have them, every one. I haven't the strength to fly from you. I struggle against it, struggle terribly; but of what use is it all when I have no backbone, when I am so weak, so cowardly! I can't fight against nature! Do you understand? I can't! I run from her—she grabs me by the coat-tails and holds me fast. Oh, what miserable, humiliating weakness!"

Elyin's face flushed; he rose and began walking up and down in front of the bench.

"It's disgusting!" he growled, clinching his fists. "I hate and despise myself! My God, to hang about another man's wife like any vulgar schoolboy, write idiotic letters, degrade myself—oh!"

Elyin groaned, grasped his head with both hands and sat down.

"And to top it all you come in with your hypocrisy," he continued. "If you are so much against my wicked game, what did you come here for? What drew you here? In my letters I ask you only for a definite, straightforward answer—yes or no; and instead of a straightforward answer you contrive to meet me here every day 'by accident,' and treat me to a dose of copy-book sermons."

Mme. Loobyantsev started and blushed furiously. She experienced a feeling of extreme confusion, as if some one had suddenly and unexpectedly stripped her of all her clothing.

"You seem to suspect me of playing," she murmured. "I have always given you straightforward answers, and—and just now I've been entreating you—"

"Bah! As if entreaties have anything to do with it! If you had once for all said 'leave me,' I should have been gone long ago. But you never said that to me. Not once did you give me a direct answer. I cannot understand this indecision! Really, either you are playing with me or—"

Elyin stopped and dropped his chin in his hands. Sophie Petrovna began to go over in her mind her be-

Wasted Lives

By John Hamilton Churchill

There are two kinds of millionaires—the kind which assumes control of riches by inheritance from generation to generation, which in Europe belongs to the upper classes or to the nobility, and the latter-day kind to be met with chiefly in America, Australia, and remote islands. In considering this question one is struck with one characteristic of the situation, namely, the intense rivalry existing between the old rich and the new, the noble millionaire, with his old mansions and estates, and the parvenu, intent on imitating the old in everything. Now the old-fashioned millionaire has one great and distinguished virtue—he never frightens us. He may do stupid things, he may throw away his money at last in a fit of decadent delirium, but he does not start out with the deliberate intention of libeling every notion of propriety, every rule of common sense and orthodox etiquette, every maxim laid down by the generations for the conservation of the thing known as good taste. I must confess that this ambition of the new millionaire to rival the refinements of aristocratic age is very interesting, and it certainly is very amusing, in spite of the intensely bitter, gnawing, hungry look most of them wear, like a mask of bitter irony; but it is impossible to feel the slightest sympathy for the woes of the parvenu millionaire of our time. We can never take him seriously. We can feel pity for every other phase of human suffering, we can sympathize with the man who murders in a fit of passion, with the people who steal because of hunger, with the people whose lives have been wrecked by follies committed under overpowering temptations, but the typical millionaire, no matter what befalls him, leaves us as cold and indifferent as a statue. And a curious thing it is, we do not even stop to ask ourselves why we are left indifferent. The woes of the millionaire species do not even arouse in us any of that vulgar curiosity we experience when we read of the divorce scandals of some obscure artist, some obscure poet, or second-rate politician.

And this leads us to indulge in a little psychology. How comes it we are not moved by the wriggling, the tortuous sufferings, the gladiatorial monetary pugilism of the millionaire kings of the world? The answer is because they are not interesting; they are machines. The more brains a man has the more interesting he becomes. Bonaparte held the world spellbound. The interest in him is far from dying out. Bonaparte may have been a machine of destiny for all we know; a mere calculating machine he certainly was not. As a matter of fact, the conqueror of Europe possessed a culture that was centuries old, and there was nothing of the parvenu in him. Had Bonaparte won a few battles by mere good luck, and then retired, he would have been forgotten by this time. Now the typical millionaire of our day never loses an opportunity of telling us that he came by his great wealth by sheer patience, backed by a vast intelligence. He wishes us to believe that he is a favored one, that he is gifted, that luck had nothing to do with his fortune. It is impossible to induce thinking people to believe this. No one who knows how to reason about men and things can be made to believe that Rockefeller and Carnegie possess distinguished minds. We know very well that if things were different and circumstances changed they would not succeed in amassing anything like their present fortune.

Everything done by the parvenu millionaire proves that he is not happy. Instead of living in comfortable homes with as little bother and trouble as possible, they erect palaces that rival royal dwellings without the cachet of royal or aristocratic distinction. When they are not collecting art treasures, which they cannot possibly appreciate, they write books which no book-lover would think of reading. And when they are not doing these things they spend vast sums trying to approach Royalty, thinking it finer to be received by Kings and Emperors as lickspittle democrats than to remain at home working to solve some of the urgent democratic questions of the time.

One of the most interesting studies of this question is to be found in the variety of millionaire types, although the great majority do look, act, and think alike. I have noticed in Germany that the Teutonic millionaire still loves his smoked sausage, Pilsener beer, and black bread. He is a democrat who loves the common while desiring the shine and the glitter of titles and show; but his brother, the Chicago pork-packer, would as soon think of eating black bread and smoked sausage as he would of eating snails. It is not easy to insult a Berlin millionaire, but one of the Chicago type is as touchy and explosive as dynamite.

In Chicago I was struck with the porkaphelian look and dimensions of many of the millionaires. They are "in tune with the infinite" possibilities of Porkopolis culture, and, in the words of the witty author of "The Conversations of Elizabeth," they are "thick through," and inhabit queer mansions, containing drawing rooms which made the French count exclaim: "Dieu! un salon d'hippotame!" They love fried chicken, and eschew their own pork, deeming abstinence the better part of the appetite. This is wise, and shows that the parvenu millionaire is not such a fool as he looks. But he has many bad habits, and one of the worst is that he is given to backsliding proclivities. He often gives up Chicago and removes to New York. Here he is snubbed for a period of years or forever, as the case may be, and his Karma begins. He lies in bed at night wondering what real difference there can be between himself and August Belmont or any of the New Yorkers, seeing that they call themselves social equals in a country given to equal privileges and equal rights. This poor creature now begins to be very unhappy. He felt at first a vague, gnawing discontent without being able to say whether the gnawing was in the region of the solar plexus or the cerebellum. Now in New York he feels certain it is not in the stomach. He has a suspicion it lies in his imagination, but in this he is never fixed, and he begins to wonder if, after all, it would not be better to live under a monarchy in Europe than to be snubbed by Republicans at home. In New York the Chicago millionaire comes in contact with another type, that peculiar college-bred, cotton-mill culture that rolls out of Harvard and Yale and Princetown and the rest with ever-increasing rapidity, as tape rolls out of the machine with figures stamped on it. The Chicago man meets the New York man, and tries to get even with him by bluff, but the assurance of the "culture" that has been pressed into the youthful scion of millionairism at the fashionable university by the cotton-gin process, the high-pressure system of quick, not to say quack, learning is too much for him, and the Chicago man grows as sick of New York as the New Yorker does of the Gallic wit and penetrating discrimination of the Parisian. He wants to go home. But he has no home. But he has one thing in common with his brother of New York; he is restless, discontented, ill at ease, ambitious to the verge of insanity, without knowing how to satisfy the intolerable craving for the impossible. As for the typical millionaires of New York, they form a sort of body whose aims and interests seem to be more or less alike, although rivalry is always in a chronic state of action.

The New York millionaire astounds us by his freak ambitions. Self-made millionaires in France usually possess sufficient knowledge of beautiful things to appreciate them for what they are, but the new rich of America purchase pictures which they never enjoy, books they never read, wines they never taste, and build houses which in no way harmonize with the real taste and temperament of the owner.

The American rich are Republicans with a full-blooded penchant for Monarchy, who hate the word progress as much as they hate philosophy and common sense. The chief ambition of the New York millionaire is to ape the dignity of dukes, the intelligence of the French, the drastic methods of Russia, the positiveness of the military German, while remaining as uncouth and illiterate as a cowboy of Colorado. It is in New York that the strange, half-savage, half-cultured, masculine woman comes proudly on to the scene. The millionaire man, poor fool, thinks he rules something or somebody. In reality his wife rules him with whips of scorpions. When she grows tired of her husband she divorces him. Sometimes she goes to Europe, and resides there for years without seeing her husband. But we never dream of pitying the husband. His woes, like her Babylonian ambitions, leave us untouched. We read about them as we read about Maeterlinck's bees or Lombroso's degenerates, or any strange new thing in a strange, crazy world ripe for the worst. But we think of the time when the remnant of Imperial Rome went mad in the ninth century, when a vast oblivion came over the nations, when all Italy rotted away, and the dust and ashes were blown out of her ruins and were scattered to the four winds of the world.

Bankers Learn a Lesson in Economy

To substitute a cheap man for a dear one is not always the best way to economize as the American Bankers' Association has learned from its experience of Detective William J. Burns, late of the Spreckels leg. About the time that the gumshoe artist lost the job of his life in this city the Pinkertons notified the Bankers' Association that they could not afford to renew their contract for the protection of the members of the Association from crooks at the old price. Learning of the state of affairs between the bankers and the Pinkertons Burns put in a bid for the contract at a figure lower than the one which the famous detective agency had decided to raise. Burns was given the contract, and as a result the bankers have a suit on their hands. About three weeks ago Burns caused the arrest of Louie Schneiderman in Los Angeles for uttering false checks and at his instigation the prisoner was taken to San Antonio, Texas, where it was discovered that he was the wrong man. Now Schneiderman is suing Burns and the Bankers' Association for $100,000 damages. The plaintiff alleges that when he was arrested he was subjected to great humiliation and personal discomfort. His trunk was ransacked for incriminating evidence, and he was thrown into jail and confined in "a dirty, unsanitary cell filled with sewer gas and infested with a multitude of loathsome bugs and vermin." The following day the officials of the Alamo National Bank declared that he was not the man who uttered the checks. He was then released with two dollars in his pocket. He was thousands of miles from home. The probability is that Schneiderman will receive in compensation a sum of money large enough to make the bankers regret that they parted from the Pinkertons.

The Democratic Situation

Meeting that most astute of our politicians, Gavin McNab, the other evening I asked him whether there was any dark horse grooming for the race against Theodore Bell for the democratic nomination for governor. "The situation is simply this," answered McNab; "some of the anti-Bell men want Hodghead of Berkeley to run and the rest of the anti-Bell men want Bell to run. They figure that he could not come within fifty thousand votes of any of the other candidates." I do not think McNab is much impressed with the talk about this being a democratic year in California notwithstanding the wonderful victories won by the democrats in the bye elections in Massachusetts and New York. Those, of course, were very respectable political straws but it is a long way across the continent and there are entirely different winds blowing here. It probably takes two years for a political wave to roll from the eastern to the western coast, so the democrats of this State cannot bank on eastern successes as indicative of what is going to happen here. I understand that Hodghead of Berkeley is quite willing to enter the race against Bell as the candidate of the regular organization or McNab Democrats but that in the opinion of the leaders it would not be worth while to incur the expense of the campaign.

Judge De Haven's Only Prejudice

Judge J. J. De Haven of the United States District Court has been in poor health for some months, and he may never return to the bench. His friends say that he is thinking seriously of resigning. Judge De Haven is a jurist of the old school, a type of man that is becoming rare in the judiciary in these days of lively competition for the limelight and stage centre. A man of the most generous impulses, possessed in a large degree of the judicial temperament, it can be justly said of him that he has made it the rule of his career to give every man his due so far as he was able. The only prejudice that he is known to have was discovered by his clerk some years ago. One day the court-room was crowded with citizens who had been invited by the Court to give such excuses as they might have for not serving on a jury panel. Among them was a middle-aged clubman, a little brother to the rich, who was notoriously free from employment. Scarcely had he opened his mouth when he was told that he was excused. Milo

Do you know what Quality means in a Turkish Cigarette? If not get a box of "MILO." Then, any other cigarette, and try same, side by side. You'll note the delicate, aromatic mildness of the "MILO." Mildness (yet with the richness in flavor) is what costs in Turkish Tobacco, and its just this that makes the Perfect Cigarette. You'll find it in No Other.

This perfection is obtained only by owning our own plantation in Turkey—the careful watchfulness from the seeding to the finished article.

THE SURBRUG COMPANY, New York City

the clerk spoke of the incident to Judge De Haven, saying, "Judge, I was sure that you wouldn't excuse Mr. ——— because I was certain that he had no legitimate excuse, and I'm curious to know why you let him go." Judge De Haven smiled. "I saw him shake hands with a friend when he entered the court-room," said the Judge; "and I'm of the opinion that no man who shakes hands horizontally on a level with his face is fit for jury duty."

His Favorite Pastime

In the days before the fire Judge De Haven indulged in a singular pastime. He lived at the Strathmore in Larkin street, and every day he spent several hours running the elevator. This was his only method of relaxation. He performed the duties of elevator conductor as gravely as he presided over the District Court, and when thus engaged no lawyer, no matter how urgent his business, would be permitted to interrupt the pastime. One day an attorney entered the elevator when Judge De Haven was on the job. He had not the slightest suspicion of the elevator man's identity, but noted his strong resemblance to the Federal judge. Slapping the elevator man on the shoulder he said, "I say, my friend, you're a dead ringer for old Judge De Haven." The Judge said nothing, but looked as though he felt like committing somebody for contempt.

The Governor and the Fight

Like the proverbial bolt from the blue was Governor Gillett's interdiction of the Jeffries-Johnson prize fight. Nothing short of another epoch-making earthquake could have exceeded the effect on our emotions produced by the announcement that Governor Gillett had decided to enforce the law of the State against a crime which the authorities have been blinking at for some years without rebuke or reproach. Great expectations were centered on the big mill. The whole city was looking forward to an event that had focussed the eyes of the nation upon us, nay, an event of international interest which promised to put oodles of money in our purse. Law abiding citizens though we are the golden prospect was so gladdening that only a few ultra-sensitive individuals experienced a revolt of conscience at the thought of acquiescing in the commission of a felony. Perhaps there were many that thought of the moral issue but had no difficulty in overcoming the consequent qualms by reflecting that the character of the impending performance had been toned down by the euphemistic phrasing of the articles of agreement. In the circumstances it required some courage on the part of Governor Gillett to interfere and ruthlessly play havoc with our fond expectations. And as it will be some time before we recover from the shock it will also be some time before the Governor's courage is appreciated. That there will be a reaction of sentiment I have not the slightest doubt. For we are bound to learn that our loss has been our gain. So far much of the censure that has been visited on the Governor is unquestionably the result of misapprehension. It is supposed that he harkened to the appeals of those meddlesome ministers who are leading a crusade against all the joys of living, and who would have us regulate our appetites in accordance with standards which to them are congenial because of the discrimination of unkind nature. But nobody that knows the Governor intimately believes that he was influenced by fanatics of ascetics. He acted from a sense of what he believed to be the best interest of the city, and in time it will be learned that he made no mistake.

The Decay of the Sport

As a matter of fact we were getting pretty tired of pugilism as practiced in this city. It was not the brutality of prize fights that wearied us. We were becoming surfeited with the sport because it had ceased to be a sport. Long ago it dawned upon us that even the tone of pugilism was susceptible of being lowered. So frequent were the revelations of collusion between plug-uglies that suspicion of crookedness was excited at every contest. We were beginning to feel that it was not so bad to run the risk of being demoralized as to run the risk of being defrauded. If blood was to be shed we wanted to see it shed in earnest. No theatrical scraps for us. It was humiliating to be victimized by illusions. Moreover this species of crookedness lowered the heroes of the ring in our estimation, bringing them down to the level of ordinary susceptible supervisors. Incidentally it may be mentioned that pugilism had a demoralizing effect on our great and glorious newspapers. In some unaccountable way the fighters and their managers obtained immunity from the kind of criticism that might have protected the public from imposture. The newspapers have been remarkably consistent in their enthusiasm about fights. Eager to draw the inference of an ulterior motive with respect to almost everything else that concerns the public the press can see nothing but purity in prize fights, nothing but honesty in plug-uglies. This singular suspension of an inherent tendency has been shown by the attitude of the press toward the Jeffries-Johnson fight. Everybody knows that the chief incentive behind the coming performance is the prospect of a rich harvest from the moving pictures. Now the suspicion is warranted that the pugilists will endeavor to make the moving pictures a success. But this is a suspicion that is never betrayed by the great engines of public opinion.

The Plans of Men and Mice

What the fighters and the fight promoters will lose by reason of the shifting of the scene of battle from San Francisco to Reno will never be known. But what they expected to make in this city is not a profound secret. The daily newspapers have estimated that fully $100,000 worth of tickets had been sold before Governor Gillett interfered. The fact is that nearly two hundred thousand dollars had come into the hands of the promoters. They were building an arena with a seating capacity of thirty thousand, and Rickard and Gleason expected to clean up two hundred thousand dollars apiece. Now as they had agreed to pay the fighters $101,000 in addition to the $20,000 which they divided between Johnson and Jeffries as a bonus when the articles of agreement were signed, and as they calculated upon receiving $50,000 as their share of the moving picture privilege, it is not hard, after estimating the cost of holding the fight, to figure out how much they expected to take in at the gate. That a great crimp was put in their calculations by the Governor's interference is evident from the circumstance that the Reno arena will have a seating capacity of only twenty thousand. To add to their discomfiture they have had occasion to worry over the moving pictures. For the hitch in their plans has excited so much comment that now the fear prevails that an agitation will be started all over the country to prohibit the exhibition of the pictures. Verily the lot of the prize fight promoter has its pathetic aspects.

A Credulous New Yorker

When the hegira of pugilists, sports and newspaper men took its recent course toward Reno there was great sorrow among the local brethren of the pad and pencil. The newspaper writers and cartoonists who came here for the big fight were a representative body of journalists, many of whom had old acquaintances to renew. All were loth to exchange the delights of San Francisco for the dreariness of the Nevada desert and many plans for entertainments in newspaperdom were knocked askew by the shifting of the scene of the fight. Incidentally some of the local newspaper boys had occasion to learn that the sophisticated scribes from wise little Manhattan were not so knowing as we have been taught to believe. This was illustrated by what happened to W. P. McLoughlin, familiarly known to his intimates as "Wurra Wurra" McLoughlin. McLoughlin is the sporting editor of the New York World and has been in San Francisco and Rowardennan for several weeks past. One day he was talking "shop" to another newspaper man and in the course of the conversation remarked: "Since I have been out here I have put over five 'scoops' on the fight situation and the peculiar thing about it is that I got them all at the bar of the St. Francis Hotel." The friend made a mental determination to frequent the St. Francis bar and impelled by curiosity asked: "What was the last 'scoop' you put over?" "Why," answered McLoughlin with a gratified smile, "I just put it on the wire a couple of hours ago. Larry Sullivan confided to me that Jack Johnson had been baptized in the Roman Catholic Church." McLoughlin's friend was aghast. "Do you mean to say that you sent that story to New York?" he exclaimed. In a very short explanation he convinced McLoughlin that Sullivan had been "stringing" him and "Wurra Wurra" lost no time in wiring an order to kill the story.

Jeffries in a Domestic Scene

I am afraid that my interest in Jeffries is not wholly that of a fight fan for during a recent visit to Rowardennan, when that beautiful resort was still on the pugilistic map, the incident which impressed me most showed the big fighter in his domestic character. Sauntering near the Jeffries cottage about sundown I saw the giant gladiator running toward the porch. "Oh Mrs. Jeffries," he cried, "oh Mrs. Jeffries." From within came the voice of Mrs. Jeffries. "What is it, Jim?" she asked. "Please get me my gum from under that chair," was the answer. In a moment Mrs. Jeffries emerged from the cottage holding two generous slabs of well-chewed gum on the palm of her hand. "Which one is yours, Jim?" she asked. And Jim selected a piece of gum, stowed it away in his mouth and went his way, happy as a school boy.

The Hardships of Reno

My heart was melted a few days ago by a conversation I had with a renowidow who dropped into town to vary the monotony of her stay in the divorce colony of Nevada by a gay whirl through the joy-resorts of our Parisian municipality. So full was her heart of the hardships of Reno life that she simply couldn't contain herself and the result was that into my sympathetic ear was poured a most harrowing tale. It has come to such a pass, she solemnly informed me, that many of the fair residents there have vowed that they will never. never sue for a divorce again but will put up with the discomforts of matrimony rather than expose themselves to the irritations of temporary sojourn in the divorce colony. She said that the hotel keepers, the tradesmen and all the other permanent population of the town, including the divorce lawyers, had but one object in view and that was to separate the wouldbe divorcees from all the money they brought with them.

How the Money Goes

The renowidow said that the old time "stand and deliver" methods of the road agents were child's play compared to the systematic holdups practiced in Reno under the present dispensation. With tears in her eyes she described the loss of her jewels and sealskins and confided her suspicions as to how they had disappeared. That the victims were powerless to protest she made quite plain to me by explaining that it would embarrass her case to have it known that she occasionally indulged in the frivolities of Reno life. From this I inferred that her losses occurred at times when an excess of animal spirits made the ordinary precautions seem trivial; when, for instance, it seemed the most natural thing in the world to fling a few jewels at a piano player or to discard a valuable wrap for greater freedom in crooking a tired elbow. I am forced to the conclusion that Reno is not a safe and sane divorce colony but a place of giddy gaiety where the wine flows freely and the tinkle of music harmonizes with the sound of woman's high-pitched laughter. If my conclusion be correct I am impelled to wonderment over the frequency with which the divorce-seekers drop down to San Francisco for diversion. Surely there can be little monotony at Reno. But no doubt some of its gay habitues exhaust its attractions as rapidly as they have already sucked the sweets of matrimonial bliss. They are a queer lot, these renowidows!

Margaret Weds Again

When Margaret Illington announced her intention of returning to the glare of the footlights there was much speculation as to whether her second marriage had proved as big a failure as her first. But it is evident that speculation on this subject is premature, since it appears that although the fair Margaret and her profession are to wed again Mr. Bowes is to figure in the menage. While Mr. Bowes has failed to alienate his wife's affections from the Muse Mrs. Bowes has succeeded in converting her husband into a theatrical manager. This in all probability was no extraordinary achievement, for the atmosphere of the theater has been Bowes's favorite for many years. He is a connoisseur of the theatrical art and he has a fine taste for stage beauties. At one time gossip buzzed excitedly over his frank admiration for Kate Condon, the shapely singer of the Tivoli company. At other times there were others who received his homage, his flowers, his lavish suppers and his expensive gifts, for Bowes was ever a generous spender and cut a wide swath when his heart was aflutter. Of his passionate attachment to his stately wife there can be no question and I am at a loss to guess what course he would pursue if the stage lured her from him as domesticity lured her from the stage and Daniel Frohman.

Is Bowes a Millionaire?

Whenever the news despatches contain a reference to Margaret Illington and her husband they manage to convey the impression that Bowes is a very wealthy man. On several occasions he has been spoken of as a millionaire. I doubt very much whether Dun or Bradstreet would confirm this newspaper rating. Before the fire Bowes was a valued employe of one of our biggest real estate firms. Always ambitious of distinction he listened to the siren voice of Judge Lawlor at the time of the impanelment of the Andrews Grand Jury and tried very hard to obtain the foremanship. From his judicial counsellor he had imbibed the notion that a young man might subjugate the popular imagination by making the grand jury the temporary storm center of the municipal government. It was a bitter disappointment to him when T. P. Andrews was chosen as foreman, but he made as much as possible out of the position of secretary and chairman of the police committee. His activities as a municipal regenerator so engrossed his attention that he could not attend properly to his duties as a real estate man and so led to his withdrawal from the firm with which he had been connected for a long time. When the earthquake came Bowes made a combination with a local merchant and bade fair for a time to revolutionize the real estate business of the city. But nothing much came of his big plans and he joined John Spring in the Tacoma land deals which are supposed to have made him wealthy. If there was money in that deal I have no doubt that Bowes got his share, but considering that conditions are none too good in Tacoma I doubt whether his takings ran into very big figures. I am forced to the conclusion that Bowes cannot be nearly as wealthy as the newspapers have represented him. But if ever the chance comes to hammer out a cool million in some big deal Bowes will not miss it for the want of ability to strike while the iron is hot.

The See-Saw of a Temperament

What particularly surprises in the announcement that Margaret Illington will lay down the work basket to take up the grease paint again is the swift change of mind that has been worked in her in a very little time. We were given to understand that all the woman of her yearned for babies and domestic quiet and there was every indication that she was to have these as the wife of Ed Bowes. Her plaint against Dan Frohman was that his managerial ambition to make her the foremost actress of America exhausted her vitality by uncongenial demands. It was explained that he was too much the manager and too little the husband. But now it seems that the stage had for her an attraction the pull of which she did not adequately measure when she indulged her dreams of babies and sock-darning. This of course is to assume that the interviewers have quoted Margaret Illington correctly. One of these interviews has her husband saying that it was his persuasion which sent her thoughts once more toward the theater. It seems that he found a French play which suited her and wanted her to star in it. Is it possible that Mrs. Bowes is returning against her better judgment merely to humor the whim of her husband? In that event history might repeat itself, although in her new venture there will be a conspicuous difference from her former stage career. This time her husband will be ever at her side. Dan Frohman did not accompany his wife on her tours but Ed Bowes will. It is possible then that she will combine the joys of domesticity with the demands of starship. Perhaps Mrs. Bowes has discovered that an actress can have babies and popular applause at one and the same time. If Ed Bowes has convinced her of that he is a more astute husband than Dan Frohman who overlooked the point.

She Should Play "Baby Mine"

If Ed Bowes is not definitely committed to the production of that French play which seems to him the proper vehicle for Margaret Illington's return to the stage, I would like to offer a suggestion. It is that he star his wife in a new farce by Margaret Mayo, recently launched in Chicago. "Baby Mine" is its name and an account of its first performance which lies before me describes it as "a farce full of babies." The critic goes on to characterise it as "a riot of obstetrical glee" but nevertheless "as clean as talcum powder and as naive as a creche." The exigencies of the plot compel a girl wife to claim as her own and her husband's, first a baby, then twins and finally triplets. The moral of the farce, (for this seems to be a farce with a moral), is: Never tell a lie or you may become the mother of triplets. The possibilities of this medium in the hands of Margaret Illington must be obvious to the dullest reader. Think of the material which the press agent would have to work upon! and of the interviews which the star might

An Appreciation of MacLafferty

It is the delight of dunces to pick out flaws in the work of genius. It was perhaps for that reason that recently I called attention to certain imperfections in the work of Mr. James Henry MacLafferty. But at that time I was not sensible of the greatness of this modest, unassuming poet. Regarding him as an ordinary, commonplace versesmith, I judged his effusions by the standards of the average critic. Now genius is above rules, not to be restrained by the trammels of technique or the limitations of rhetoric. Greatness must be unfettered. We cannot confine the sea in bottles. We cannot measure the mountains with compasses. As we do not judge Shakespeare by rules of grammar or the definitions given in the dictionary we must allow Mr. MacLafferty equal freedom of defiance; for the man who has celebrated the meadow lark in immortal verse is not of the common herd of lyric artists. There have been poets who have written poems more beautiful than MacLafferty's, but there is none more entitled to the bays that are bestowed for speed. It is not what MacLafferty says, or how he says it, but how fast he can say it. Style he despises as a luxury, substance as a superfluity, but for speed he has Shakespeare faded. He is the laureate of the automobile age. The speed lust is in his wrist.

A Poem in Prose

I deserve no credit for having discovered the peculiar, unsurpassed merit of our popular poet. What I know of his record-breaking pace in composition I have learned from a booklet issued by the Paul Elder Company in celebration of a notable literary achievement. The booklet serves a double purpose: it gives to the world a pome that is perhaps MacLafferty's greatest—"The City Loved Around the World"—and it tells in burning words and feverish phrases the thrilling history of the composition from the birth of the inspiration down to the utterance of the last felicitous thought. This historical sketch is a poem in prose, the authorship of which is entirely a matter of suspicion. I quote:

The dawn of an inspiration has always a psychological interest if only from the curious fact that the fickle goddess delights in incongruities and finds her opportunity in the irrelevant On the night of October 17, Mr. MacLafferty had used the phrase, "the city loved around the world," in some general writing upon which he was engaged, and the phrase was still haunting his mind upon the afternoon of the following day when he had occasion to visit one of the city banks upon business connected with his firm.

Hardly had he entered the door when the completed verse flooded into his mind. Fearing that it would vanish with the unexpected speed of its arrival, Mr. MacLafferty advanced quickly to one of the windows where he expected to transact his business, seized a scrap of paper upon which to imprison the unforseen guest and promptly found himself the object of an aggressive and strenuous suspicion on the part of two strangers who were standing in front of the window and until then unnoticed, who objected, and not unpardonably, to the use of their money draft even for the esthetic purpose contemplated by the poet.

Explanations and apologies became the order of the day, but fortunately the inspiration was gracious enough to tarry during the lubrication of troubled feelings and until a less pretentious scrap of paper could be immortalized by the first draft of the civic hymn, that has so fitly expressed the true sentiment of those who know this city, whether living within its bounds or at the uttermost parts of the earth

Who that reads the above can fail to appreciate the greatness of MacLaffetry? Here unquestionably is the poet of his generation, the poet born in response to the hour, the poet with faculties attuned to the cravings of his contemporaries. A man who can write poetry while you wait is as great a benefactor to his race as the quick-lunch. Think of the long-felt want that he can fill dashing off obituary verses before the corpse is cold! But enough—to apprehend the greatness of MacLafferty you must read the masterpiece of this lightning composer:

The Pride of the West!
The Gem of the Sea!
The City that Is!
The City to Be!
Where the ship "Content" her sail has furled;
The City Loved Around the World!
San Francisco!

A Dramatic Critic's Recollections

Peter Robertson, the veteran dramatic critic of the Chronicle, was at the opening performance of Margaret Anglin. It is the first time that I have seen Robertson in a theater since the earthquake which shook him out of his critical chair. Charles De Young was with him at the Anglin performance and made him known to the dramatic critics who were present, all young men whose experience began about the time that Robertson's ended. Robertson is spending his leisure at Boyes Springs, cultivating his anecdotage on Sonoma County mineral water. He is well along with a volume of reminiscences which should be widely popular, for Robertson's working knowledge of the men and women of the theater extends over two decades of high achievement. This will not be Robertson's first essay in publishing. His "Seedy Gentleman" had a very good sale before the fire and is now, I think, out of print.

THERE is no need for you to be worn out by holiday preparations if you make good use of your telephone.

The Bell telephone companies have found that just before Christmas the number of daily connections is the highest for the year. The telephone has become a necessity of the holiday season, because without it most people would not have time to do what they have planned.

Christmas cheer extends beyond the city limits, and the universal Bell System helps to carry it throughout the land.

An Actress's Quick Retort

When "The Easiest Way" was still a subject of vigorous critical discussion in New York the charge was freely made that Eugene Walter, the author, found his inspiration in Pinero's "Iris." This fact lends piquancy to a story about Virginia Harned which I have from a member of her supporting company at the Alcazar. Miss Harned attended a matinee of "The Easiest Way" with Eugene Walter and his wife Charlotte Walker. After the big scene Miss Walker turned impulsively to Miss Harned and exclaimed, "Oh, my dear Virginia, you should play 'The Easiest Way.' Whereupon with a sweet smile and a sidelong glance at the playwright Iris answered, "But my dear Charlotte, I have." But Walter never batted a lid.

The March of Progress

Truly the world do move! And so rapidly that East and West seem to have met, Kipling to the contrary notwithstanding. Here we have the Gaekwar of Baroda traveling over sea and land to visit his young hopeful, a sophomore at Harvard. What would Clive or Warren Hastings have said to that? Would Macaulay himself with his eye of a seer have anticipated anything so unlikely? And yet it is no more extraordinary that the Gaekwar of Baroda should send his son to Harvard than that Chinese and Japanese princes should choose Vassar or Bryn Mawr for their daughters' education. We are living in an age of wonders but our minds are commonplace and do not grasp their colorful possibilities. Though of course we have all been impressed by the Gaekwar with his wealth fabulous as that of Ormus or his own Inde and by his wife and daughter in their native draperies. So impressed have some of us been with the latter that we forgot ordinary politeness and stared them out of countenance as they dined at the Palace. Thus does the Central American mestizo stare at the traveling American as he discusses his tortilla and frijoles. Not liking to be stared at the American goes forth and kicks the mestizo to remind him of his manners, but the Gaekwar was more forebearing. He submitted to the ordeal like a gentleman. I do not think the papers made much of the Gaekwar's arrival. Wait till he reaches the East and watch the big enterprising papers. They know how to make the most of these traveling potenates. But I must say that Cholly Francisco's rhymes on the Gaekwar were a very clever imitation of the famous newspaper poem on the death of the Ahkoond of Swat beginning, "What! What! What! What's the news from Swat?"

The Maori Dancers

A band of Maori dancers that arrived last week also supplied me with material for philosophical reflection. These natives of New Zealand have been at the hippodrome in New York and after a very successful engagement are on their way to their Polynesian home. I saw this very interesting band dance at a Press Club jinks last Saturday night. The men and women dance separately, their dances having various ceremonial and warlike meanings. In none that they gave did I observe any of the suggestiveness which is so marked a feature of the dances of the Kanakas and other Polynesian races to which the Maoris are allied. Perhaps they expurgated their entertainment for fear of shocking the unsophisticated newspapermen. To see these men and women go through their weird contortions in their feathered and beaded costumes one would imagine them primeval savages but as a matter of fact it seems that the Maoris are all perfectly civilized. The masculine members of this band are farmers and tradesmen of various callings, and the women are married and the mothers of large families. It seems that the old dances have been preserved, partly as a historical curiosity and partly as an excellent exercise in physical culture. Thus does the savage of the bush acknowledge with Maud Allan the potency of Delsarte! The untamed native is hard to find nowadays when the steam engine toots through Uganda and the Maori practices physical culture and plays Rugby.

A Student of Macaulay

The Maoris entered into the spirit of the occasion at the Press Club and it was an extremely merry occasion, being graced by a number of eastern newspapermen out here for the Jeffries-Johnson fight. As well as I could ascertain the Scotch highball seems to be the favorite drink of the natives. During the course of the jinks I wandered into the red room and found a number of the brightly costumed natives who had deserted the festivities and were enjoying a social glass in quietude. About ten of them were here, reclined at their ease, sipping their Scotch and puffing violently at their cigars. At some distance and regarding them with rapt intensity sat Grant Carpenter. Now Grant Carpenter is a deep thinker, a student of esoteric philosophy and one whose words are golden and correspondingly scarce. "Here," thought I, "is being born some great thought, an inspiration caught from the contemplation of these wonderful natives." So I asked Carpenter what he was thinking about. He seemed to come forth from a trance when I addressed him. "I was just trying to decide," he said, "which of these New Zealanders will take his stand on a broken arch of London Bridge to sketch the ruins of St. Paul's."

A Defiant Army Chaplain

I notice that the Examiner calls attention in its army notes to the court martial in Manila of Chaplain J. E. Dallam who has been sentenced to a reprimand for speaking disrespectfully of Captain Frank D. Wickham in the presence of junior officers. Captain Wickham was in the vicinity of Lieutenant Janney's quarters on the occasion of the dinner party when the trouble arose between the lieutenant and his wife (formerly Madeline McKissick) over a wine cooler which Mrs. Janney had presented to Lieutenant-Colonel Ames. The chaplain seemed to infer that if Captain Wickham had interfered the suicide of Lieutenant Janney might have been prevented. Not only did the chaplain reiterate his charge of heartlessness and cowardice in a letter but after his court martial he defied his military superiors in a communication to a Manila newspaper. The chaplain declared that in becoming an army chaplain he had not surrendered one of his duties as a clergyman which was to rebuke wrongdoing. "If a chaplain," he wrote, "is expected to surrender his professional duty and remain silent in the presence of wrong because a man ranks him, let the public judge of the type of clergymen who will in the future accept commissions." Now this would raise a difficult question of authority were it not for one circumstance which the Examiner in reporting the case has overlooked. The fact is that Chaplain Dallam who by the way is pretty well known in this city is thought by the military authorities to be off his balance and he is now under observation in the division hospital of Luzon. If it is proved that the chaplain was suffering from a mental disorder when he wrote his letter of criticism it will of course take the sting out of his reprimand and at the same time it will impair the value of his protest as a clergyman against military authority.

The Too Domestic Bears

San Franciscans who have been sojourning in the Yosemite bring back a good story about the bears that are so interesting a feature of the valley. Everybody who brings a kodak to the Yosemite wants to get a snapshot of the bears and all sorts of devices are used for luring them to the trails. The favorite method is to leave pancakes covered with honey on the trail and as bears are wonderfully fond of honey they seldom disappoint. Another way is to lie in wait near the pit where the garbage is dumped, the bears being in the habit of foraging there. Major Forsythe who is in charge of the valley has been a good deal disturbed about the bear situation for some time, and recently he issued an order strictly forbidding the feeding of the animals. In explanation of his order he says he fears that if the pampering of the bears with pancakes and honey continues they will soon be tame and the idea of bruin sauntering tamed along the valley trails is too much for the imagination of the major.

What's in a Spreckels Name?

Who is going to be known as Mrs. Claus Spreckels? That is the question which is ruffling the serenity of the feminine portion of the Spreckels clan. Shortly after the passing of Claus Spreckels, when all of the Spreckels women went into the deepest of crinkled mourning, Mrs. C. Augustus Spreckels returned to town. Just a few months later Mrs. Claus Spreckels also passed away. Immediately Mrs. C. Augustus Spreckels, as her friends had known her ever since her marriage, announced that thereafter she would call herself Mrs. Claus A. Spreckels, to perpetuate the name and fame which the founder of the house had sweetened with his sugar millions. Quantities of stationery were ordered engraved with the new appellation. Then young Claus, the son of John D., married a San Jose beauty who had ideas on the prestige of a name with which her youthful husband coincided. They insisted that as there was no Claus Spreckels but young Claus Spreckels, no one else had a right to the name and that Mrs. Claus Augustus would do well to continue to call herself by the name by which she had always been known. It is an interesting controversy and the Spreckels' friends are in a quandary, not knowing how to remain in the good favor of the families who dispute the honor. It seems too that the various Spreckels families have taken sides in the matter and interesting developments may ensue.

The Tale of a Wedding Present

The wedding present industry recently suffered a setback in this city owing to an incident which, if it establishes a precedent, threatens to cripple the trade. It happened as follows: The daughter of a well-known family who was one of the year's brides was showered with girls. She was prominent and popular in her set and the silver trade boomed for a few weeks preceding the marriage. No less than fourteen silver bowls and as many platters were bestowed, and odd pieces without number more than the bride could well use in the comparatively modest establishment awaiting her. But the necessary flat silver was not forthcoming. Finally when the influx of presents ceased as the wedding day approached the bride's father visited the silversmith's shop whence came most of the supply of gifts, and purchased a handsome case of flat silver which was charged to his account. At the bride's home it was shown to her friends with the other donations and all were duly admired. After the excitement was over and the young couple had departed on their honeymoon trip the father took charge of the situation. He packed dozens of silver dishes and vases and despatched them to the silversmith with orders to credit them to his account. The request could not be refused and the case of silver was more than paid for by the useless offerings of friends. The views of the merchant who has still on his books a balance of several hundred dollars in favor of the enterprising parent are not fit to be recorded.

The Marriage of Milos Gopcevic

For the second time in his career Milos Gopcevic has taken the bavardes by surprise. Quietly, without any of the ostentation of formal announcement he has captured the heart of a beautiful, clever and wealthy girl and has taken her off for a honeymoon among the oaks and orange trees of Konotayee on Clear Lake. The bavardes do not like this sort of thing. They do not approve of romances unless they are taken into the secret. They object to grooms who woo without publicity and to brides who show an unwillingness to have their trousseaux described in print. The bavardes were not told how many engagement cups Miss Marion Dodd received, how many friends entertained in honor of her approaching wedding, what kind of a present the groom gave her; they were left absolutely in ignorance of all the tremendous trifles to which the public has the right of minute information, according to the well-defined bavarde code. That a romance conducted on such unconventional lines can bring happiness the bavardes are not willing to believe. And yet there are those of us who do not take the bavardes as seriously as they would like to be taken, who entertain the old-fashioned idea that Milos Gopcevic and his bride conducted their heart affairs in an admirable manner. It may be heresy to think that a marriage of the wealthy, like a marriage of the poor, may eventuate in ideal bliss without the "bless you, my children, bless you" of the gushing bavardes, but 'tis a heresy to which I for one pin my faith.

When He Married Harry Floyd

When Milos Gopcevic relinquished the grip of a Sacramento street car in 1903 to lead the rich Miss Harry Floyd to the altar, the blow almost killed the bavardes. The thought of a wealthy American girl marrying merely for love staggered them with indignation. In their own picturesque journalese it was "too incredible to be believed." They maundered over it for many a column. Their comments on the romance were hysterical. They attributed the action of Miss Floyd to the fact that she was not reared as a society butterfly and then, with the candor born of an obtuseness almost profound, they told of the early training of the girl. Quite without intending to do so they showed that her young life was spent in a most wholesome atmosphere and in a manner calculated to inspire her with ideals higher than those cherished by the simpering soulless daughters of the conventional rich. Her girlhood was spent far from the gilded cotillons where the seines are set by matchmaking mammas to catch the gold-fish, so the bavardes concluded that she was tremendously handicapped for life's struggle.

The Aftermath of That Marriage

That Harry Floyd lived in great happiness with her husband during the brief span that was allotted to her there can be no doubt. Those who enjoyed their hospitality in this city or at beautiful Konotayee know how completely the couple were wrapped up in each other. And those to whom Milos Gopcevic has opened his heart know what a severe blow the death of his wife was to him. And yet the envy and the malice which his marriage excited among those who had their own plans for Harry Floyd pursued him after her death. The perjuries by which the character of Hary Floyd was assailed in the will contest at Lakeport seem unbelievable, considering that they came from the lips of those whom the dead girl had befriended for years. The trial of that case was one of the most sensational that California has ever had. Owing to the fact that only one newspaper was represented at Lakeport and to the difficulty of communication between Lakeport and San Francisco the story of the court proceedings is not very well known. It was a story full of the stuff of romance, embodying exhibitions of the very best and the very worst of which human nature is capable. Had not one friend of the deceased heiress, Miss Pritchard, stood loyally by her memory and by Milos Gopcevic, the will which Harry Floyd had made would in all likelihood have been broken. With Miss Pritchard's assistance Gopcevic demolished the slanderous fabrications of his wife's erstwhile friends and saved the million dollar estate which had been willed to him.

An Ideal Place for a Honeymoon

Konotayee on Clear Lake whither Gopcevic has taken his bride is the most beautiful estate in Lake County and an ideal spot for a honeymoon. The old house built by Captain Floyd is everywhere reminiscent of the eccentric old sea captain. The verandas have the curve of a hurricane deck and are religiously holystoned; there is a chart room full of nautical instruments and books and maps of the sea, all kept as they were in Captain Floyd's lifetime. The house is full of rare art treasures, statues, paintings, de luxe editions and strange bibelots. There are pictures of Harry Floyd in the suits of armor and other medieval costumes which she so passionately loved; and there are also portraits of the Servian kings from whom Milos Gopcevic claims descent. To wander through the old-fashioned rooms is to breathe the atmosphere of old-world enchantment. The acres of cultivated ground about the house, laid out in formal parterres of flowers and shrubs and fruit trees are kept up with scrupulous care. In the boat house are the fastest steam launches on the lake, in one of which Harry Floyd loved to follow the flight of the crane or to race to Lakeport to welcome her fair-weather friends and bring them to the hospitality which they afterwards so shamefully abused. Truly Milos Gopcevic and his bride could not spend their honeymoon in a more romantic place. And in all California there is no spot so completely shut off from the prying eyes of the bavardes—a circumstance, I dare say, which is not going to worry Gopcevic or his bride.

The recital given last Thursday evening in the California Conservatory of Music Hall in Presidio avenue by George Kruger, head of the piano department and George Walcker, head of the voice department, was a success in every way. The attendance was large and included many of the prominent musical people of the city as well as many from across the bay. Both artists were warmly received, liberally applauded and called upon for several encores. The program included several favorite songs by Schubert, Brahms and Tschaikowsky and instrumental selections from Chopin, Liszt and Rubinstein

The Coming of Teddy Jr.

Society down the peninsula is eagerly awaiting the arrival of the young Theodore Roosevelts who are due early in July. It is hoped they will make their home in the neighborhood of Burlingame where the bride's connections, the Crockers, all live. In San Mateo Mr. and Mrs. William Lawrence Breeze are old friends of the Roosevelts. Mrs. Breeze's brother, Hamilton Fish Jr., and Eliot Cutler, the fiance of her sister, Miss Emily Fish who spent last winter in Burlingame, were both among the ushers at Monday's wedding. The William Lawrence Breezes, by the way, are not related to the California family of whom a William married Miss Norwood of San Francisco but the similarity of names causes frequent confusion.

That Ensigncy Examination

I have heard some very cutting things said at the expense of Midshipman John Lawrence Kauffman, the youngster who is engaged to Miss Elsa Draper, because he failed to pass his examination for promotion to the rank of ensign. Some of our society gossips whose tongues gallop so fast that their charity is unable to keep pace have been expressing a very contemptuous opinion of the young man for his failure. They have been quite scathing too in their references to the tea parties which he has given in honor of his affianced and her girl friends, declaring that a naval officer should not take part in such feminine forms of entertainment. All such remarks as these are exceedingly unjust. In the first place I don't think that the innovation of a tea party given by a gentleman is at all open to condemnation. The first to introduce the idea here was Emile Bruguiere who has never been suspected of effeminate tendencies. As to that ensigncy examination the censure is still more unjust. I was talking on the subject to a naval officer a few days ago and he stated that the examination in navigation, the one in which young Kauffman failed, was the stiffest ever prepared at the Naval Academy. It was full of catch questions and was not at all an adequate test of a midshipman's ability to navigate a vessel of Uncle Sam's. Out of two hundred who took that examination more than a hundred were plucked and only eighty-nine finally passed. The instructor who prepared the questions was reprimanded for his pains. So you see young Kauffman is not deserving of the harsh criticisms which have been leveled at him.

Paris and Baroda Fashions

The circle in which fashion is said to move appears to have been rounded at the Palace last Friday night when the Maharani of Baroda, wearing a style of gown which has been in vogue in India for the past eight or ten centuries met in the Palm Garden the fashionable elegantes attired in a mode which Paris, borrowing its daring from the Orient, is attempting to foist on the women of western civilization. The garments which the exquisitely beautiful creatures from India wore with perfect sang froid and ease were received by the women at the Palace with gasps of surprised admiration and many wondered at the quickness with which the Hindu beauties had adopted the very latest and most daring fashion of Paris. These critics did not realize that Paris in this instance was following the East. Other women in the Palm Room that evening were heard to criticise the visiting aristocrats in terms of shocked horror. With a perverted sense of modesty and a barbarous conception of art they were blind to the beauty and simplicity of the robes worn by these high caste women and declared them atrocious. Probably the Hindu women, if they thought about the matter at all, made the same criticism of the attire of the women surrounding them. The Maharani of Baroda and her daughter, the princess, the latter reputed one of the most beautiful women in the fashionable society of Calcutta, quite justified by their appearance the claim of being wife and daughter of the second richest man in India. Yet there was nothing bizarre or startling about their attire. In accordance with the English court custom of mourning they wore only pearl jewelry—large pear-shaped pearls in their ears and pearl bracelets and necklaces.

Indian Toilet Mysteries Revealed

Any fashionable modiste would have celebrated as a triumph of her career the achievement of a costume such as these little dark-eyed beauties wore at dinner. These women, though unaccustomed to work of any other sort, arrange their own gowns, practically fashioning them every time they put them on. Not a seam or so much as a line of stitching mars the beauty of the wonderful material of which these unique dresses are draped. The Marahani, in a short chat, told all about the mysterious process. The gowns are made of some nine or ten yards of the gauzy brocaded and embroidered chiffon, dexterously and wonderfully wound about the body. The lower edge of the material which is quite wide, is of heavy brocade, giving sufficient weight to the gown to make it hang well. In the back the material is gathered to give fulness to the skirt and train, but in the front there is not the least fulness. Then the material is again wound about the body rather closely, forming a tunic overskirt, terminating at the knees. This outlines the contour of the figure closely. Continuing this winding the drapery is swathed over the silken jersey rather loosely, forming a draped bodice. The end of the material is carried loosely over the shoulders and head, being worn as a scarf, the cascaded ends of this shawl-like wrap being carried gracefully in the curve of the arm. Sometimes the gossamer wrap drops off the head, revealing a coiffure of brilliant black hair, wavy and soft, parted in the center and caught in a coil at the nape of the neck. The brilliant contrasts of the red robe with its old-gold brocade border, bringing into prominence the blackness of the silky hair and the brilliance of the large dark eyes, are as picturesque as any artist's conception of Oriental beauty. The complexion of the younger woman is a clear creamy olive and the symmetry of her features is pure Aryan. By way of a "beauty spot" the Maharani has a crimson mark in the middle of her forehead, of the color and size of a raspberry, this being the sign of her aristocratic caste.

Oakland Social Invaders

It is becoming the custom for ambitious Oakland parents to launch their daughters on the social sea of San Francisco. Last winter we had the Bowles' of Piedmont with us, and next season we are promised the Egbert Stones whose debutante daughter Harriet will bring them across the bay. There are three younger girls in the Stone household, so we may look for the family in our midst for several years to come. They own a large place in the Elmhurst district of Oakland where they are socially important. The Stones will emulate the Bowles' and establish themselves at the Fairmont, and like Miss Amy Bowles, Miss Stone promises to be a great sucess. The William Henshaws were the first Oaklanders to settle in San Francisco society. They took a house in Pacific avenue several years ago and intended to make their home here. Plans were drawn for a handsome residence to be built in Broadway where Miss Florence Henshaw was to make her debut, but the call of Oakland was ever in their ears and the Henshaws returned to their Vernon Heights home which has since sheltered them. The Van Sicklens also found the Alameda shore unsatisfying socially and in order that their debutante daughter Dorothy might be untrammeled by bay trips they occupied a residence in town last winter.

It Will Live a Little Longer

San Rafael and Ross Valley are unusually quiet these days on account of the large number of residents who have gone abroad. The only event which relieved the sultry monotony last week was a meeting held for the purpose of deciding whether the little Lagunitas Club should live or die. The Lagunitas Club has been suffering from ingrowing exclusiveness and of late days has taken such a bad turn that many thought it should be put through its death throes as quickly and as decently as possible. After a lengthy debate it was decided, however, that the club should be nursed a little longer, so the members will continue to pay dues and assessments as cheerfully as possible. Out at the Marin Golf and Country Club the recently organized Ladies Day has proved quite a successful institution. On each Ladies Day some feminine member gets up an afternoon at bridge followed by tea. Many find this an easy way of paying social obligations without incurring the anxiety and expense of a big card party in their own homes. The prizes for these card affairs are provided by the club. Recent hostesses have been Mrs. Frank Anderson, Mrs. Frank Johnson and Mrs. C. J. Foster.

Fireworks at Del Monte

The announcement that Del Monte will celebrate the Fourth of July in the old fashioned way with plenty of fireworks is refreshing news to those who are not entirely satisfied with a safe and sane Fourth. On the great crescent of sandy beach at Hotel Del Monte everything is ready for shooting off firecrackers and other fireworks. Here one can bring the children and enjoy a noisy Fourth in perfect safety beside the sea. In the evening the usual brilliant pyrotechnic display will be made on the lawn in front of the hotel after which there will be an informal dance in the ball room. As most of the other large resorts are either within the limits of a town or have declared against fireworks, this puts Del Monte in a class by itself for the holiday and no doubt it will entertain a large crowd. The hotel is so large and its grounds so extensive that the noise of exploding fireworks on the beach will not disturb the guests in the hotel. Special railroad rates will be made for the holidays.

Passenger Officials at Pebble Lodge

Following out one of the pet plans of the late Mr. Harriman, who believed that the men of each department of his vast system should come together once a year, the traffic managers, general passenger agents, their assistants and others connected with the passenger service have been in session for the past two weeks at Hotel Del Monte. This is called the annual "family" meeting in which all advertising programs of the past year are criticised and the plans for the coming campaign for business submitted and discussed. It is one of the year's most notable gatherings in railroad circles. On last Saturday night the members of this convention were entertained at a beautiful dinner and dance at Pebble Beach Lodge, given by A. D. Shepard, general manager of the Pacific Improvement Company. The table was set in a hollow square, the center of which was banked with flowers and the table itself was a mass of blooms. After the dinner a number of impromptu speeches were made and toasts given in which the health of the absent officials was pledged. After dancing until a late hour the party took automobiles and drove over the forty miles of scenic boulevards which have recently been opened up. The views of forest, mountain and sea as obtained from the new roads, under the witchery of the moonlight, were of remarkable beauty and made a deep impression on the passenger men.

In the Social Spotlight

Among those who went to Santa Cruz from this city for the opening of the Casino last week were: C. K. Yarbrough, Mrs. M. White, Mr. and Mrs. R. Boyd, G. Blast, J. Murphy, Mrs. G. Murphy, Miss H. Johnson, H. Benkman, J. C. Smyth, Alice King, Mr. and Mrs. F. Wakers and Mr. and Mrs. H. C. Styker.

The list of arrivals at Highland Springs for the week ending June 15 included the following from San Francisco: Frank J. Barrett, Mr. McNichols, Mr. T. Harvey, Chas. Sutro, Mr. Hurley, Mr. and Mrs. L. A. French and daughter, W. E. Schuck, Frank E. Caine, O. W. Greenwold, Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Griffich, H. M. Ames, T. W. Eaton, T. C. Phillips, M. C. Hunt, L. H. Coolidge, C. H. Upton, Wm. Purdy, S. G. Stont, Geo. Pardy, Mr. and Mrs. H. F. Smith and son, Mr. and Mrs. E. G. Shonwasser, Mr. and Mrs. Frank R. Sweeney, Mr. and Mrs. I. H. Moore, J. Beisenace, Judge and Mrs. Thos Graham, Ethyl Graham, Irene Glover and E. I. Fleiger.

Mr. and Mrs. E. C. Easterbrook who have been spending the early summer at the Metropole in Oakland left during the week for Castle Crag farm where they are to remain for two months or more.

The Eugene Lents and their family have opened their picturesque cottage at Castle Crag Farm and are planning to spend the greater portion of the summer there.

Mrs. Wakefield Baker and her family have joined the fashionable colony at Castle Crag, having opened their cottage there.

Mrs. M. S. Leffingwell and Mrs. W. B. Leffingwell of Chicago are visitors in town and are registered at the Hotel Victoria.

Captain Arthur Cranston, U. S. A., and Mrs. Cranston spent the week in town. They were guests at the Hotel Victoria.

Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Garlick have returned from a delightful honeymoon trip in the southern part of the State and are established in their home, 2125 Durant avenue, Berkeley. Mrs. Garlick was Miss Isabel Morris before her marriage on May 25.

Mrs. J. M. Driscoll and Miss M. Verdon are registered at Aetna Springs.

The service set was added to during the week by the arrival at the Palace of Captain Cyrus A. Dolph and Mrs. Dolph, accompanied by Captain W. M. Baker and Mrs. Baker who motored up from the Presidio of Monterey for an indefinite stay.

Mrs. Fred H. Beaver, Mrs. Frank D. Madison, Mrs. R. T. Pierce, Miss Ruth Casey and Mr. Fred H. Beaver Jr. motored to Aetna Springs recently.

Pretty Henriette Blanding arrived from New York Wednesday after an absence of about a year, and joined her parents at their apartments at the Fairmont, and later motored to Belvedere to the Blanding summer home. Miss Blanding is a student at Vassar and will return to her studies in September. Coming from New York with Miss Blanding was Tevis Blanding who has just returned from a lengthy trip abroad, having spent more than two years in Europe.

Dr. E. J. Boyes and Mrs. Boyes motored down from Oakland to the Vendome with their guests, Mrs. C. Schilling and Dr. and Mrs. E. Boyes.

Mrs. W. W. Young and Miss Edith Young of San Francisco have taken apartments at the Vendome for the season.

One of the pretty affairs of the week was the birthday luncheon given to Miss Marian Zeile at the Fairmont on Monday. The party was very informal and was hurriedly arranged as a surprise to the popular young lady. The luncheon table was daintily decorated in the orchid shades of sweet peas, with bon bons and large corsage bouquets at each place. After the luncheon a frosted birthday cake was brought forth. The covers were laid for twelve. The guests included Mrs. Charles Mills, Mrs. Cadwallader, Misses Julia Langhorne, Millaird, Florence Hopkins, Martha Calhoun, Mary Keeney, Wilson Page, Lou Foster and Sarah Coffin.

The court of the Palace continues to be the center of attraction for society during the tea hour from 4 until 5 o'clock. Mrs. William Cluff and her pretty daughters, Mrs. Clem Tobin, Mrs. Jack Wilson, Mrs. C. Frederick Kohl, Mrs. Andrew Welch, Mrs. William Ashe, Mrs. Fletcher Ryer and Miss Doris are frequent visitors in town from their country homes or hotels, and were all guests at the Palace for tea during the past week, entertaining small informal parties.

A Warning to Margaret Anglin

By Edward F. O'Day

Although not for a moment imagining that it will do a bit of good I am going to flash a warning sign for Miss Margaret Anglin. I feel called upon to lift an admonitory finger, though conscious that she may never heed its appeal. Being surcharged with good advice I must empty my bosom of the perilous stuff at the risk of being accounted a busybody and a fool. Will Miss Anglin kindly pardon me for interfering in her professional career? Will she please refrain from sending Mr. Louis Nethersole to the office to annihilate me? Will she let me live long enough to see the error of my ways, if they be erroneous, or to justify myself to my own conceit if they be correct? Well, I suppose I cannot make terms with the enemy in advance of the battle or find forgiveness for my sin before it is committed, so here goes for my deep offending! My dear Miss Anglin, let me warn you against going the way of Mrs. Leslie Carter. Now let me explain, Miss Anglin. It is not my fault that you reminded me of Mrs. Carter. You forced the comparison on me by your acting. During the first act of "The Awakening of Helena Ritchie" I could not decide just what was the matter with you, although I hadn't the least difficulty in deciding what was the matter with the play. During the second act I began to see dimly where the truth lay. In the third act it burst upon me with full force and when that third curtain fell I put it to myself thus: Miss Anglin is becoming a Leslie Carter. I was pained by the discovery of this brutal truth. Even now, Miss Anglin, I am quite sure that it hurts me more than it hurts you. For there was a time when you did not remind me of Mrs. Carter, most emphatically you did not. There was nothing Carteresque about your Sophy Fulgarney or your Mrs. Dane. Those parts were your very own. It is a long time since I have seen you, so I cannot say how long this metamorphosis of an Anglin into a Carter has been going on. It has gone a long way now, but it is not yet too late to regain your own personality. Your voice has taken on the Carter husk a little, but it is not spoiled yet, except in those irritating half-hysterical laughs which are heard nowhere but on the stage. You must get rid of those laughs. In your movements about the stage I trace the influence of Mrs. Carter too, an affected swimming gait very popular in novels but atrocious in real life, and a simulation of bouncing girlishness that does not sit well on your mature years. But of course when I speak of Mrs. Carter's influence upon you I am thinking principally of her tears, her heavy-splashing tears and the confounded maundering that goes with them. It was the maundering and the tears that brought the truth home to me in the third act. When you grovelled before the youngster and sobbingly besought him for forty kisses my thoughts flew back to Du Barry in the tumbrel sluicing the stage at the thought of unpicked violets. I wondered whether your handkerchief was more or less sodden than hers. I made little wagers with myself as to the probable duration of the downpour. But just the same I was very unhappy. Not over your stage grief, by any means, but over your dramatic backsliding. To think that an actress of your promise should go the way of Mrs. Carter! that you should set up a goddess of tear-moistened clay for your idolatry! Why, Florence Roberts does that sort of thing much better than Mrs. Carter, having more brains, so why in the name of common sense should you hitch your wagon to a burnt-out Belasco star? But I did not intend to scold you. I wanted rather to plead with you to turn back before it is too late. Think of it! You might some day be tempted to emulate the Leslie Carter hair! If you ever fell so low you would deserve to be punished with the Leslie Carter embonpoint. But there is plenty of time to reform and be forgiven. Awaken, even as Helena Ritchie awakened, be yourself again and reap the rewards of good acting. To make your reformation easier I suppose we ought to bestir ourselves to find you a play worth while. Not one written by a woman; not one that drags under the burden of its superabundant dialogue; not one built to tap the tear ducts and flood the aisles with salt water; not one in which you fight to have "the wrong righted"; not one in which you find the answer to life's problem in the prattle of an adopted child; not one—but what's the use of growing rhetorical? If you must have the man and the child and the rest of it, let the man be a cad out of real life, let the kid be cross-eyed and bandy-legged and let your sin entangle you as we see sin entangling women every day, not in the absurd manner of antiquated melodrama. Then let us see what you do with yourself and with your audiences. You are working on a formula now, the Leslie Carter pons asinorum which any actress can learn. Be yourself, Miss Anglin, in a play worth while. But don't depend on me to find it for you. The best I have to offer is a warning and some good advice.

In the Limelight

Henrietta Crosman's new play "Anti-Matrimony" is said to be a real live farce provocative of no end of laughter. Miss Crosman and her company have been splendidly cast in the Mackaye piece which will be seen here next month.

Henry W. Savage's production of the European-American success "Madame X" is scheduled for the coming season at the Columbia.

Holbrook Blinn comes here as leading man with Mrs. Fiske. He is said to offer an exceptionally artistic performance as Karsten Bernick in Ibsen's "Pillars of Society."

The "Antigone" Performance

The next important event at the Greek Theater of the University of California will be the first appearance there of Margaret Anglin on the night of Thursday, June 30. Not only will the occasion be Miss Anglin's first appearance at the Greek Theater, but it will also be her first essay of the role of Antigone, the heroine of perhaps the greatest tragedy of Sophokles. The members of the company that support her at the Columbia will go with her to the Greek Theater but in addition several artists have come on from the East to complete the cast of the tragedy. "Antigone" has been performed at the Greek Theater at least on one occasion by students and members of the university but this will be the first time that a professional company has appeared there in a Greek play and for that matter it will be the first time that a professional company has been seen in a Greek play anywhere in America since the year 1846 when "Antigone" was given for twelve nights in New York. Preparations for the performance have been on foot since March last and in the interim a good deal has been accomplished to render the production worthy. Mr. George Riddle of Harvard University and a well-known authority on the Greek drama, is in charge of the details and he has been engaged with Miss Anglin and her company for the past two months. He is now in the city completing the final arrangements and putting the details together. Dr. J. Fred Wolle of Berkeley has organized a large symphony orchestra for the performance of the beautiful "Antigone" music that Mendelssohn wrote. He likewise has organized a superb chorus for the odes.

Miss Harned as Camille

Virginia Harned's fourth week at the Alcazar, commencing next Monday night, will be made memorable by an elaborate production of her own version of "Camille" with William Courtenay as Armand Duval and the full strength of the Alcazar stock company in the cast. When Miss Harned decided to add "Camille" to her reportoire she subjected it to a thorough revision, eliminating unnatural scenes and superfluous dialogue, inserting numerous bits of "business" that added to the general effectiveness—in brief, transforming it from a rather old-fashioned creation into one that complies with the requirements of modern dramaturgy while retaining all the heart appeal that has made it a classic.

A Beauty at the Orpheum

Annabelle Whitford, one of the most popular of the Zeigfeld beauties, has been secured for a vaudeville tour of the Orpheum Circuit and will be the headline attraction of next week's program. Miss Whitford will present a singing novelty in three scenes, the features of which are "The Flirting Girl," "The Newspaper Girl" and "The Aeroplane Girl." The big novelty of her offering is the aeroplane number in which she floats over the audience distributing verses and flowers. A highly artistic feature of the new bill will be the Five Olympiers in a series of statuary poses. Frank White and Lew Simmons, minstrel comedians, will appear in their blackface character study, "The Band Wagon." Clement De Lion's offering will be a sleight-of-hand performance. Next week will conclude the engagements of Peter Donald and Meta Carson, Clown Zertho's Canine Comedians, Lewis McCord & Co. and Maude and Gladys Finney, champion lady swimmers.

Miss Anglin's Second Week

Margaret Anglin's final week begins on Monday next. The program will be the same as the first (with the exception of Thursday evening when the Columbia will be dark). There will be Wednesday and Saturday matinees and a second and last special matinee of "Mrs. Dane's Defense" on Friday afternoon. There will be no performance on Thursday evening so that Miss Anglin and her associates may accept the invitation of the Dramatic and Musical Committee of the University of California to appear at the Greek Theater in Berkeley, there to give a special production of the "Antigone" of Sophokles.

Grand Opera at Idora

Italian grand opera will be the attraction at Idora Park next month. The season will begin in the middle of July and will last four weeks. All the popular grand operas will be presented. Idora's theater is cool and well ventilated, so it is ideal for summer engagements. The Bevani Company is recognized as a high class organization. Eugenio Battain and Umberto Sacchetti, two well known tenors; Achille Alberti and Ettore Campani, baritones; Estelle Burgess, Rogeria Vicarino and Guiditta Francini, sopranos, and Edince de Dreux and Anna Lorenz, contraltos, are among the New York singers who have signed with Bevani for the Idora engagement.

SAN FRANCISCO'S FIRST GAS WORKS

It occupied the block fronting on First Street and bounded by Fremont, Howard, and Natoma. Barges delivered Australian coal right at the works, a location now six blocks from the waterfront. The streets of San Francisco were first lighted by gas the night of February 11th, 1854. At that time the works produced 50,000 cubic feet of gas a day; the city's population was about 50,000; and the price of gas was $15 a thousand cubic feet.

The present great gas works at the Potrero. It manufactures 15,000,000 cubic feet of gas a day in winter. The city's population is now 450,000; and the price of gas is $1 a thousand cubic feet.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—There has been very little of interest in the financial or industrial world in the recent week. The security market has worked within a narrow range, marking time, awaiting the passage of the railway bill and the adjournment of Congress. Crop weather was all that could be desired over a wide area of agricultural country with the result that the crop outlook is very satisfactory. This is the chief warranty at the present for a continuance of business prosperity and on it the expectation of large earnings for railways and industries is based. In the closing hour of the week a sharp advance occurred in leading stocks which cannot be ascribed to short covering or public buying, but to the leading banking interests who are satisfied that conditions are bettering and that greater stability will prevail for a while at least. We believe that stocks will work higher.

Wheat—Dry weather crop scares in the Northwest on the one hand and lack of demand for cash wheat on the other hand made a rather puzzling market at times last week. The tendency was to advance the price of the deferred and depress the value of the near months. Caution born of the last two or three years of expensive experience had the effect of running many shorts to cover and forcing the level of all prices higher, but the list of changes of prices of the various futures is significant and should be duly noted. Each day is changing countless acres of wheat field scenery into actual merchandise that must be paid for. This process is rapidly substituting carrying charges or an approach toward them for the big premiums for the cash article that have been the rule for many months. Crop scare markets are prime favorites with wheat speculators. If the scares have a real foundation and result in serious crop losses, it usually means substantial advances in prices. The howl that has gone up because of the appearance of summer temperatures has been accentuated by the claims of the statisticians that the Northwest is deficient in moisture. There is no indication that millers will not be able to buy all the new wheat they need at very reasonable prices soon.

Corn—Corn has barely held its own for spot and July delivery during the last week, but has advanced some for deferred deliveries. The latter have been influenced by the speculative wheat strength. The lack of shipping call of any importance for the cash grain is the cause of the relative dragging of the present or nearby property. Talk of poor stand and backwardness of the crop has been constant all spring and undoubtedly represents the actual situation. There is little talk of poor color however. Very little is heard of increase in corn acreage. There is a big supply of old corn in the farmers' hands.

Cotton—In the beginning of the week there was an absence of interest in the cotton market with narrow fluctuations. Prices moved within a limited range, outside trades were small and operations were largely professional. This week the conditions have been apparently more normal. There have been several days of bright conditions in the Central West and conditions are improving in the East. With fair and warm weather during the coming days very rapid progress should be made in the cultivation and growth of the crop. On the showing made by the weather map traders might have sold new crop contracts but for the control exercised over the old crop remnant by the bull faction. True, new crop deliveries are held at a mighty big discount under the old, and appear cheap at the price but there is yet no proof that such discounts are either safe or dangerous. A crop back-set would change the coming season's price equation over night. Favorable weather throughout the season may supply ample cotton for consumers' needs. Thus far, however, some people have not been able to figure out a tangible chance for the restoration of reserve stock. This feature of the situation is and will be the main bull card. Whereas against this, it is a fact that such a large percentage of the cotton mills will have shut down through the country that there will be no such demand for the staple. Every day makes us see all the more plainly the opportunities for scalping this market and we unqualifiedly advise that course.

Copper—At the moment there is nothing in the situation on which to base predictions of an early advance in metal prices. General business seems to be slowing up all over the country. This is chiefly due of course to the inability of railroads to finance and keep up their normal new construction work and to the unsettled state of confidence in the investment circles. The fact that copper consumption is now greater than ever before in the history of the trade and almost equal to the abnormally increased volume of production, is in a way the most encouraging feature of the situation. If something were to happen to re-establish industrial and financial confidence the increase of copper consumption in this country alone would quickly turn the course of the market and within three or six months the metal would again sell at 15 cents. The outlook is now just about as bad as it possibly can be and we therefore think the time near at hand when there will be a sudden and decided change for the better. If the price declines to 12 cents a large increase in consumption is practically certain. The history of the metal market presents numerous demonstrations of the increase in consumption when the price drops to around 12 cents. The recent noticeable increase in the European consumption has been due in part to the very low price of metal. Statistics show that the situation is not as bad as it was a year ago and in consequence we are optimistic in regard to the stock market for good standard copper stocks as well as for an increase in the price of metal in the not very distant future.

vehicles left the city and drove toward the Laguna de la Merced, about ten or twelve miles from the city. Here the fight was to take place. It was cold, and the drivers frequently lost their way in the darkness. The breeze from the ocean cut like a knife. As day broke a buggy was descried a short distance ahead, occupied, as we learned on overtaking it, by Henry Fritz, a confidential friend of Broderick. Notwithstanding his excessive corpulence, Fritz was blue with cold, and his teeth rattled like castanets. Another buggy, containing Dr. Hammond, Judge Terry's surgeon, was driven out of a small canyon. Other carriages were seen coming from different directions and skirting the lake. They all drew up at a rail fence which marked the boundaries of a milk-ranch owned by one Davis, who rubbed his eyes in sleepy astonishment at such an irruption of visitors. There was not much conversation. One or two remarks were made, and a partisan of Terry's audibly whispered that Broderick might be carried dead from the field. Everybody seemed to feel that to one man, at least, that beautiful day was to be a day of death. Vaulting over the fence, the party went up a valley the centre of which had been selected as the scene of the encounter. Mr. Broderick had slept at the Lake House, near by, and with his friends was early on the ground. Judge Terry and his friends were also prompt. About eighty spectators were present.

The seconds held a conference, and the pistols were examined and loaded. Judge Terry won the choice of weapons by the toss of a half-dollar. Mr. Hayes marked off the prescribed distance, ten paces, and warned spectators to get out of the line of fire. Meantime the respective seconds were busied about their principals. The Terry party were cool and collected, as became old hands at the business. Mr. Broderick's friends were apparently nervous and hesitating. One incident was not calculated to put the Senator in good heart. Mr. Haskell partly untied the Senator's cravat, and then walked off a few paces, wringing his hands as though overcome by his feelings. He then returned and removed the neckerchief.

Broderick was dressed in a long black surtout, and wore a soft wool hat drawn down over his brow. Terry was similarly attired. When the principals were placed, the punctilios of the code were observed. Calhoun Benham, Terry's chief second, approached Mr. Broderick, and passed his hands closely over his sides and chest, searching for concealed mail. Mr. McKibben made a similar examination of Terry, but he only touched his fingers to his waistcoat, bowed and withdrew. It has been thought that Mr. Benham's action irritated the Senator and impaired his poise. Before this Mr. Broderick had taken some coins from his vest-pocket and passed them to Mr. McKibben. Terry gave his loose change to Benham, who scattered it contemptuously on the sward. All things being in readiness, the pistols were cocked and hair-triggers set by the seconds. They were then delivered to the combatants. It was observed at this time that Mr. Broderick appeared nervous and ill at ease. He repeatedly twitched the skirts of his surtout, as though they were in his way. He was also somewhat out of position, and Mr. McKibben corrected him. Broderick closely measured with his eye the ground between himself and Terry. Benham read the conditions of the meeting, and Mr. Colton followed with instructions as to the firing. He had won the word. Broderick was still nervous, but Terry stood firm and erect, a silhouette against the early morning light. The men held their weapons muzzle downward. A moment of painful silence ensued.

"Gentlemen," said Mr. Colton, in a clear voice, "are you ready?" Both replied, but Broderick delayed a few seconds. He then said, "I am ready."

"Fire! One—" There was a report from the Senator's pistol. It was answered in a second by Terry's weapon. Broderick's pistol was discharged before he brought it to a level. This was probably caused by the fineness of the hair-trigger and his want of familiarity with that particular weapon. The bullet buried itself in the ground, two-thirds of the distance between himself and his antagonist. It was a splendid line-shot, fallen short of its mark. Broderick had the reputation of being an expert with the pistol, and this result surprised those who knew his skill. With the crack of Terry's weapon Broderick winced, turned half round, and then made an effort to recover himself. "Hard hit," his friends murmured. These words were proved by his unavailing efforts to maintain an upright position. He dropped until finally he fell prone on the ground, with his pale face toward the sky. He was hard hit.

The wounded Senator lay on the sward, with his head supported by his seconds, Colton and Haskell. His surgeon, Dr. Von Loehr, was nervous, and seemed uncertain how to act, and incapable of taking prompt measures. Mr. Broderick's life was ebbing away, and his face was pallid. Mr. Brooks, one of Terry's seconds, advanced, and, on behalf of his principal, tendered the services of his surgeon, Dr. Hammond.

"Yes, for God's sake," exclaimed McKibben, who was greatly excited, "send some one here, or Mr. Broderick will die where he lies!"

Dr. Hammond then came to Dr. Loehr's assistance, and cut away the wounded man's clothing, exposing his chest and the wound. It was a sorry sight. With every breath arterial blood spurted from the wound in bright jets and stained the fair skin. The group surrounding the fallen man shuddered. Strength of constitution, fortified by abstemious habits, might enable him to hold death off for a short time, but the brightness of the blood told that he was doomed. The ball entered the right breast between the second and third ribs, passing under the sternum, fracturing the edge, and then took a course over the heart, through the upper lobe of the left lung, striking the fifth rib on the left side, and proceeding upward, passed through the left armpit. Its tortuous course was remarkable, and the rending of the vitals must have been terrible. No wonder the Senator was unable to maintain an erect position for a second shot, and no wonder that he sank nerveless to the earth.

"Baker," said he, on his dying bed, to his fast friend, the orator, soldier, and statesman,—and they were the last words he spoke to him,—"Baker, I tried to stand firm when I was struck; but I could not. The blow blinded me."

As soon as Broderick fell, Davis, the owner of the ranch, who had been silently regarding the proceedings, started to his feet and shouted, "That is murder, by God!" He moved toward Terry, as though intending to assault him. He was intercepted by bystanders, who said that it was folly to provoke additional bloodshed. Davis brushed them aside, exclaiming, "I am Broderick's friend; I am not going to see him killed in that way. If you are men, you will join me in avenging his death."

"We know you are Mr. Broderick's friend, but we know as well that if you attack Terry there will be a general fight, and but few will get oft this ground alive. Think a moment before you do this thing."

Luckily,this scene was not witnessed, nor the remarks overheard, by any of the Terry patisans, elese there would have been a bloody conflict, whether their leader had been attacked or not. The milkman was quieted and sat himself down, breathing threatenings of slaughter.

Terry remained in his place. His arms were folded, and the muzzle of a pistol projected behind him. He stood erect, with face raised and an inquiring look, as though awaiting a demand for a second shot. His coolness and nerve were shown in the remark just after he delivered the fire: "The shot is not mortal; I have struck two inches to the right." Others say his words were, "Ah! I struck him a little too high."

Being assured of the helpless condition of his antagonist, he moved toward the carriages with his friends and then drove hastily to the city. He went to Stockton, where he owned a ranch, and quietly awaited events. Here he was arrested on the 23d of September by two San Francisco police officers, brought to the city, and put under ten thousand dollars bonds.

Mr. Broderick was removed from the ground three-quarters of an hour after he was shot, placed on a mattress in a spring wagon, and taken to the residence of his friend Leonidas Haskell, at Black Point. He lingered in great pain until Friday, September 16, and expired at 9:20 in the morning. He did not speak much during his suffering. From his rent and torn breast no breath came without exertion. Words were agony. He felt, to use his own expression, as though a thousand-pound weight was pressing on his chest. But he did utter a sentiment which had great significance a few years after his death. "They have killed me," he said, "because I was opposed to slavery and a corrupt administration."

The death-bed scene was deeply affecting. The viaticum had been given by the priest, Father Maraschi. Around the couch, which had been drawn into the centre of the room, weeping friends were grouped—those who had honored and loved him in life, and were now assembled to witness, through their tears, the exit of that great soul that had won men and controlled councils. There were present Mr. and Mrs. Haskell, the Misses McDougall, Miss Cook, Colonel Edward D. Baker, ex-Governor McDougall, Hon. J. C. McKibben, General Colton, Hon. John Conness, Colonel A. J. Butler, John A. McGlynn, Elliott J. Moore, Herman Wohler, Moses Flannagan, and many others, prominent in social and political life, whom he had "grappled to his heart with hooks of steel." Governor McDougall stepped forward and closed the eyes that had looked their last.

havior from beginning to end. She remembered distinctly that all the time, not only outwardly, but in her innermost thoughts, she had disapproved of Elyin's attentions; but at the same time she felt that there was some truth in what the advocate had just said. And, in her inability to determine just what that truth meant, she could not, try as she would, find one word to say in answer to his complaint. But it was embarrassing to remain silent, so she answered with a shrug:

"So I am to blame yet?"

"Oh, I don't blame you for being hypocritical. Your hypocrisy is natural and quite in the order of things. If everybody would suddenly enter into a conspiracy to become sincere, everything would go to the dogs; there would be complete ruin."

Sophie Petrovna was not in a mood for philosophy, but she was glad of the opportunity to change the subject and asked:

"What do you mean?"

"I mean that only animals are free from hypocrisy. Since civilization has developed in us a necessity for such commodities as womanly virtue, for instance, sincerity is entirely out of place."

Elyin dug his walking-stick angrily into the sand. Mme. Loobyantsev listened to him; there was much she did not understand, but she enjoyed his conversation none the less. First of all, it pleased her to think that this clever man was talking to her, an ordinary woman, about "learned matters"; then, it gave her great pleasure merely to watch the movements of the pale, mobile, angry young face. Much she did not understand, but what was perfectly clear to her was the beautiful daring with which he attacked tremendous problems and arrived at certain definite conclusions.

Suddenly she became conscious that she was admiring him and grew frightened.

"Pardon me, but I really do not understand," she hastened to remark, "why you started this conversation about hypocrisy. I repeat my entreaty: be a good, kind friend; leave me in peace. I ask it in all sincerity."

"Very well, I shall try to struggle on," sighed Elyin. "I shall try hard, but I doubt whether anything will come of my efforts. Either I shall put a bullet through my brain, or—take to drink in the most idiotic fashion. But I will surely come to no good! Everything has its limit, you know—even fighting against nature! Tell me, can you fight against insanity? If you drink wine, how can you avoid the consequent excitement? What am I to do when your image has fastened itself upon my heart and will not leave me for an instant, day or night, but stands constantly before my eyes as vividly as does that pine? Come, teach me—what great exploit must I accomplish in order to rid myself of this horrible, unfortunate state in which my thoughts, my desires, my dreams belong not to me, but to some demon that has taken possession of me? I love you. I love you so much that I am completely transformed. I have abandoned every duty, given up my work, forsaken my dearest friends, forgotten my God! Never in my whole life have I loved like this!"

Sophie Petrovna, who was totally unprepared for such an outburst, made a sudden startled movement away from Elyin and looked up with terror into his face. There were tears in his eyes, his lips quivered and his whole face was overflowing with a peculiar expression of hungry pleading.

"I love you!" he muttered, bending his eyes on her large, terror-stricken eyes. "How beautiful you are! See how I suffer! And yet—I swear it—all my life I would gladly spend thus, sitting beside you, suffering and gazing into your eyes But—don't speak, I beg of you!"

Like one dazed Sophie Petrovna was trying to think quickly; trying to find some word that would stop him.

"I must go!" she decided at last. But hardly had she made a movement to rise, when Elyin was on his knees at her feet. He was embracing her knees, gazing up into her face, talking to her eloquently, tenderly, passionately. In her terror and bewilderment, she did not hear his words; somehow at this dangerous moment, with that sweet pressure caressing her like a warm bath, she was trying, with peculiar, cruel curiosity, to analyze her own sensations; searching for some possible, hidden meaning in it all. She was furious at herself because, instead of a feeling of outraged virtue, she was filled with delicious languor, almost stupor—like a drunkard totally oblivious to everything. Only somewhere in the depths of her soul, a distant, fractional part of herself was jeering maliciously: "Well, why don't you go? All this is as it should be then! Yes?"

Still striving to discover some meaning within herself, she could not understand why she did not snatch away her hand, to which Elyin's lips were now clinging, nor just what made her glance hastily to right and left at the same time with Elyin to see if anyone were looking. The pines and the clouds were motionless and stern, like aged tutors who see mischief brewing yet are obliged to maintain silence, having accepted bribes not to inform the superior powers. The sentinel stood columnlike on the embankment and seemingly looked in the direction of the bench.

"Let him look!" thought Sophie Petrovna.

"But—but listen to me!" she cried desperately at last. "What will all this lead to? What will come afterward?"

"I don't know, I don't know!" he whispered with a wave of the hand, as if to put aside all unpleasant questions.

Suddenly the harsh, shrill whistle of the locomotive burst upon the air. The cold, irrelevant sound of daily prose caused Mme. Loobyantsev to start violently.

"I haven't time—I must go!" she said, rising hastily. "There is the train. Andrew is coming; he will want his dinner."

She started at a rapid pace toward the embankment, her face flaming. First the locomotive crawled by slowly, then the cars appeared. It was not, as she had supposed, the local passenger train, but a freight train. In a long, dreary row—like the days of our earthly existence—across the white background of the distant church, stretched the cars, one after another, seemingly without end!

At last the train passed by and the last car, with lanterns and conductors, disappeared behind the distant green of the thick forest. Sophie Petrovna turned sharply round and, without looking at Elyin, walked rapidly back through the opening in the forest. She was already master of herself. Scarlet with shame, outraged—not by Elyin; oh, no! but by her own weakness, he own shamelessness in permitting a strange man to embrace her knees—she thought now of but one thing: how most quickly to reach her home, her family. The advocate could hardly keep up with her. Turning from the opening in a narrow path, she looked back at him so swiftly that she only caught a glimpse of the sand on his knees. She waved her hand to him to leave her and ran on.

When she had reached home she went into her room and stood motionless for about five minutes, looking now at the window, now at her writing-table.

"Oh, you wretch!" she scolded herself; "you wretch!"

To punish herself, she purposely tried to recall every detail of her behavior during the past few weeks. She reminded herself that though she had always been opposed to the attentions of Elyin, yet something constantly drew her on to go and have explanations with him; not only that, but, while he was wallowing in the sand at her feet, she was experiencing the most inexpressible joy. She pitilessly recalled everything, and, panting with shame, was ready to beat herself. "Poor Andrew!" she thought, at the recollection of her husband, trying to give her face an expression of utmost tenderness. "Barbara, my poor little girl, she does not know what a mother she has! Forgive me, my dear ones! I love you dearly—dearly!"

And, anxious to prove to herself that she was still a good wife and mother, that the taint had not yet penetrated to the "foundations," about which she had been telling Elyin, Sophie Petrovna rushed into the kitchen and began to scold the maid because she had not yet set the table for Andrew's dinner. She tried to summon up before her imagination the image of her hungry, tired husband; uttered a few commiserating words aloud, and with her own hands proceeded to set the table for him—something she had never done before. Then she hunted up her daughter Barbara, took her up in her arms and embraced her warmly. The little girl struck her as rather cold and heavy, but she would not admit it to herself, and began explaining to the child what a good, kind, honest man her papa was.

But when, soon after, Andrew Elyich actually arrived, she hardly greeted him. The influx of feigned emotion had ebbed away, having proved nothing, having only irritated and embittered her by its utter falseness.

She sat near the window, suffering and raging within herself. Only in trouble does one realize how hard it is to be master of one's thoughts and feelings. Sophie Petrovna said afterwards that such a turmoil raged within her that it was as impossible to disentangle a single clear sensation in the general confusion, as to count a flock of robins while they are on the wing.

From the fact, for instance, that she was not overjoyed by the arrival of her husband and that his manner of eating annoyed her, she suddenly came to the conclusion that she was beginning to hate her husband.

Andrew Elyich, faint with weariness and hunger, could not wait until they handed him his soup, but fell upon the sausages, chewing noisily as he ate.

"Heavens!" though Sophie Petrovna, "I love him and respect him, but why does he chew so disgustingly?"

In her thoughts there was no less disorder than in her feelings. Mme. Loobyantsev, like everybody else inexperienced in battling with unpleasant thoughts, tried with all her might not to think of her misfortune, and the more earnestly she tried, the more distinctly she beheld in her imagination the form of Elyin, the sand on his knees, the fluffy clouds, the train.

"Whatever possessed me, fool that I was, to go there today?" she tormented herself. "And am I really so weak that I cannot count on myself?"

Fear has large eyes. While Andrew Elyich was still at his last dish, she had already decided to tell her husband everything and fly from the danger!

"There is something I must speak to you about seriously, Andrew," she began after dinner, while her husband was taking off his coat and boots before lying down to rest.

"Well?"

"Let us go away from here!"

"Hm—where to? It's too early for town yet."

"No, let us travel, or do something like—"

"Travel," muttered the notary, stretching himself. "I dream about it myself, but where is one to get the money! And who is to take care of the office in my absence?"

Then after a moment's thought he added:

"True, it must be lonely for you here! Why not go yourself?"

Sophie Petrovna agreed, but immediately considered that

Elyin would probably take advantage of the opportunity and go with her, on the same train, in the same car. She sat thinking and looking at her husband, who was no longer hungry but still tired. For some reason her glances paused at his little, almost feminine feet in their striped hose, the tips of which ended in two little threads.

Behind the lowered window-shade a belated bee droned and knocked against the pane. Sophie Petrovna was looking at the threads, listening to the bee and imagining herself on the train. Opposite her, day and night, sat Elyin, his eyes riveted upon her face, fuming at his helplessness, pale and suffering. He terms himself "a vulgar schoolboy," scolds her, pulls his hair; at last night falls and he snatches a moment when the passengers fall asleep or leave the car at the station, to kneel before her and embrace her knees, as he had done at the bench.

She found herself dreaming and roused herself with a start.

"Listen, I shall not go alone!" she said. "You must go with me."

"That's nonsense, my little Sophie!" sighed Loobyantsev. "You must be reasonable; you must want only possible things."

"You'll go when you find out," thought Sophie Petrovna.

And, having then and there made up her mind to go at all hazards, she considered herself out of danger. Little by little her thoughts began to assume shape. She grew lively and even let herself think what she pleased. "Go ahead, think all you want, you're going just the same!" she thought.

While her husband slept, evening came stealing on little by little. She sat at the piano in the parlor. The general animation outside that evening always brings, the sound of the music, and above all, the thought of her cleverness in getting the better of her threatened misfortune, set her entirely at rest and put her in good spirits. Other women in her place, her pacified conscience was saying to her, could never have withstood it; they would have gone off like a whirlwind. But she—she was different; why, she almost died of shame, suffered agonies, and now was fleeing from the danger—which, by the way, probably never even existed! So touched was she by her own strength and virtue, that two or three times she looked up and smiled at herself in the mirror opposite.

When it grew dark, visitors came. The men went into the dining-room to play cards, the ladies occupied the parlor and terrace. Last of all came Elyin. He looked sad, morose, almost ill. He sat down in the corner of the sofa and never once left it during the entire evening. Usually gay and talkative, this evening he remained silent, occasionally frowning and rubbing his eyes. When anyone addressed him he tried to force a smile that resulted only in a curl of his upper lip, and answered curtly and sullenly. He made several attempts at witticisms, but his sallies were harsh and rude. To Sophie Petrovna he seemed on the verge of hysterics. Only now, as she sat there at the piano, she realized for the first time that this unfortunate man was beyond jesting, that he was sick at heart and could not find a place for himself. For her sake he was wasting his youth, his career, spending his last money on maintaining the cottage near her, forsaking his mother and sister, and, worst of all, fast becoming a physical wreck under the unequal struggle with his own self. For purely humane reasons, she ought to treat him seriously.

She realized all this with painful clearness. If she had at that moment gone up to him and said "no!" her voice would have expressed a power that could not have been misunderstood or gainsaid. But she did not go up and say it to him. She did not think anything about it. The pettiness and egotism of a youthful nature had never clamored so strongly within her, it seemed, as that night. She knew full well that Elyin was unhappy, that he sat there on the sofa as if upon hot coals. Her heart ached for him; but at the same time the presence of the man who loved her so that it caused him suffering, only filled her with the consciousness of her power, with exultation. She gloried in her youth, her beauty, her aloofness and—because she was fortunately going away—she abandoned herself entirely to the enjoyment of the moment. She flirted, laughed ceaselessly, sang with unusual feeling and inspiration.

Everything pleased her, everything made her laugh. She laughed at the recollection of the incident at the bench, at the sentinel's watching them. Everything was funny: the guests, Elyin's rude sallies, the pin in his scarf—which, by the way, she had never seen before. It represented a red serpent with two diamonds for eyes. It struck her as so irresistibly funny that she was ready to shower it with kisses.

She sang the romances nervously, with an odd, half-tipsy provocativeness. As if purposely, to tease him, she selected those that were saddest, most melancholy; those that told of wasted hopes, of the past, of old age: "And age was approaching still nearer and nearer," she sang. But what had she to do with old age?

"Something's wrong with me," came into her head every now and then in the midst of her laughter and singing.

The visitors left at about twelve o'clock. Elyin was the last to go.

Sophie Petrovna had enough bravado left to escort him to the lowest step of the terrace. She felt a sudden impulse to announce to him that she was going away with her husband and see the effect the news would produce on him.

The moon was hidden behind the clouds, but it was light enough for Sophie Petrovna to see how the wind played with the skirts of his overcoat and the drapery of the terrace. She could also see how pale Elyin was and how, in his effort to smile, his upper lip twitched

"Sophie, dearest, Sophie—my darling!" he muttered suddenly, before she had time to say a word. "My love, my angel."

In a paroxysm of tenderness, tears choking his voice, he was pouring forth endearing terms, each tenderer than the last. To her amazement, he suddenly threw one arm about her waist and took hold of her elbow with his other hand.

"My darling, my beauty!" he whispered, kissing the nape of her neck. "Be honest with yourself—come with me now!"

She slipped out of his arms and flung back her heard to break into an outburst of rage and indignation, to rebel against the insult; but no outburst came and of all her boasted virtue and innocence there was left only enough to make use of a phrase that the most ordinary of women might have uttered under similar circumstances.

"You are mad!"

"Please come!" continued Elyin. "Now I am convinced, as I was there on the bench, that you, Sophie, are as helpless as I am. You too, it seems, are to come to no good. You love me and you are trying in vain to haggle with your conscience."

Seeing her make a start to go, he caught her by the lace on her sleeve, and finished quickly:

"If not today, then tomorrow; but give in you must! Then why put it off? My dearest, loveliest Sophie, the sentence is pronounced. Why delay its execution? Why go on deceiving yourself?"

Sophie Petrovna broke away from him and dashed into the house. Returning to the parlor, she mechanically closed the piano, looked long at the music stand and sat down. She could neither stand nor think. Of all her excitement and hilarity, there was left her only a feeling of terrible weakness, languor and loneliness. Her conscience whispered to her that she had behaved badly, foolishly, all the evening—like a crazy schoolgirl; to think that not a moment ago that man was actually embracing her out there on the terrace, and even at this moment she was experiencing a feeling of peculiar uneasiness at her waist and elbow. There was not a soul in the parlor. Only one candle was burning. Mme. Loobyantsev sat on the round stool before the piano without stirring, waiting for something to happen. And, as if taking advantage of the darkness and her extreme lassitude, a vague, irresistible desire began to take possession of her. Like a snake it coiled itself about her, fettering her limbs, her soul; it grew with every passing second, and no longer threatened vaguely, but stood before her clearly, in all its nakedness.

For about half an hour she sat motionless, making no effort to interrupt her thoughts about Elyin; then she rose wearily and crept into the bedroom. Andrew Elyich was already in bed. She sat down at the open window and gave herself up to her thoughts. There was no longer any turmoil in her soul; all her thoughts and feelings crowded harmoniously about one definite object. She did make one last effort to struggle, but immediately waved her hand in despair. She now understood perfectly the full and inexorable power of the enemy. To wrestle with it strength and courage were necessary, and life, her birth, her education, had given her nothing to lean upon.

"You horrible, wicked wretch!" she lashed herself. "So that's the kind you are!"

Her offended dignity so rebelled against her weakness that she heaped upon herself every abuse she could think of. She reviled herself; she accused herself of the most painful, the most humiliating things. She said to herself that she had never been decent, that the only reason why she had never fallen before was because there was no pretext before, that even her boasted struggle with herself was nothing but a diversion, a farce.

"Admitting that I did struggle," thought she, "what of that! Those who sell themselves also struggle; but they do sell themselves none the less! Struggle, indeed! To curdle like milk in a day—in one single day!"

She even convinced herself of the fact that it was not her feelings that were dragging her from home, not even the personality of Elyin, but the sensations that were awaiting her—just like the rest of the summer ladies who idled and flirted their time away.

"The child of its mother bereft!" sang someone in a hoarse tenor outside.

"If I am going, it is time!" thought Sophie Petrovna. Her heart began to beat furiously.

"Andrew!" she almost screamed. "Listen:we—we will go away? Yes?"

"Yes, I have already told you. Go yourself!"

"But listen," she succeeded in saying. "If you don't go with me, you run the risk of losing me! I think I am in love!"

"With whom?" asked Andrew Elyich.

"What difference does it make to you with whom?" shrieked Sophie Petrovna.

Andrew Elyich sat up and looked in surprise at the dim form of his wife.

"Nonsense!" he yawned.

He did not believe it, but was a bit startled none the less. After a moment's thought, he put a few unimportant questions to his wife, expressed his views upon family relations in general, upon faithlessness; continued thus languidly for about ten minutes and lay down again. His lecture made no impression.

Notwithstanding the lateness of the hour, some of the summer residents could still be heard talking and singing outside. Sophie Petrovna threw on a light cape, and stood still a few moments, thinking. She had still enough steadfastness left to say to her drowsy husband:

"Are you asleep? I am going to take a walk. Will you come with me?"

It was her last hope. Receiving no reply, she went out. It was windy and chilly. She walked on and on feeling neither the wind nor the darkness. An irresistible power was dragging her onward and, had she stopped, it seemed to her that it would have pushed her from behind.

"You wretch!" she muttered mechanically. "You abominable creature!"

She was panting, burning with shame; her limbs shook so that she could hardly walk; but that which was forcing her onward was stronger than her shame, than her reason, than her terror.

Auto Notes

Jack Gleason, the well known base ball manager and one of the promoters of the Jeffries-Johnson fight, recently took delivery of a new Chalmers "40" touring car. This is Mr. Gleason's first automobile and the purchase was made after a thorough try-out of all the high grade cars in the market. Mr. Gleason has noticed the performance of the Chalmers cars in the different cities throughout the East and a number of his eastern friends are owners of this well known car.

The enviable reputation built up by the Morgan & Wright Nobby Tread Tires during the winter just past has done much to dispel the idea that chains are the only successful anti-skid device. The Nobbies have proven practically skid proof, due principally to the oblique arrangement of the knobs. One of the most conclusive testimonials to their absolute efficacy comes from Joe Gradham, driver of the Chalmers pathfinder for this year's Glidden tour. Gradham declares that on the whole of the 2,900 mile pathfinding trip the use of chains was not once necessary. The Nobby Treads with which his car was equipped were able to contend with the worst mud found on the route.

The Chanslor & Lyon Motor Supply Co. has opened its Fresno branch. Large shipments have already been made to the Raisin City and other supplies are being prepared for immediate delivery. The establishment of this Fresno branch was largely necessitated by the increasing demand for motor supplies throughout the interior section of the State.

The Bay Cities Electric Company reports the following sales of Columbus Electric automobiles during the week of June 6: one four passenger Columbus Electric Stanhope to Mr. Albert Frank of San Francisco, one two passenger Columbus Electric Victoria to Dr. McG. Stuart of Santa Rosa, Cal., and during the week of June 12, one two passenger Columbus Electric Victoria to Miss Flora E. Gladding of San Francisco, one four passenger Columbus Electric Stanhope to Mrs. Rowley of Berkeley, Cal., one four passenger Columbus Electric Stanhope to Mrs. H. W. Naylor of Berkeley, Cal.

A. B. Chubbic of San Francisco is a firm believer in the superiority of Diamond Tires. Mr. Chubbic has a Packard Landelet which has been doing service for the last thirteen months and all this time the car has been wearing the Diamond Tires with which it was originally equipped. In spite of the fact that the machine has exceeded 1000 miles each of these thirteen months, three of the tires are still in good condition and one still carries the air with which it was originally inflated.

The Pioneer Automobile Company, 726 Golden Gate avenue, report the following sales: Hudson Touring to Nermandin Campen Carriage Company, San Jose; S. W. Niblock, Fresno; R. G. Fowler, Gilroy; W. H. Cain, Woodland; G. L. Weathers, Visalia; R. Robison, Pinole. Hudson Roadsters to R. C. Fowler, Gilroy; Mt. Whitney Power & Electric Company, Visalia; Guy Kennedy, Chico; C. E. Cumberson, San Francisco; Thos. Maclay, Petaluma; D. H. Steinmetz, Sonora, and Dr. T. L. Blanchard. Chalmers "40" to G. L. Weathers, Visalia; Tribune Publishing Company, Oakland; C. H. Bush, Oakland. Chalmers "30" to J. H. Mercer, Eureka; C. R. Zaccharias, Modesto; J. L. Frerichs, Byron; R. McMullen, Fort Bragg; R. E. Dickson, Olema; J. J. Brown, Woodland; Fleishman, Clarke Company, San Francisco, and W. H. Brooks, Porterville.

Chas. F. Curry, candidate for the gubernatorial nomination, has just completed a campaign trip through the Sacramento Valley in a Dorris car. He made thirty-three towns between Dunsmuir and Sacramento, giving seven days to the work. From Dunsmuir to McCloud the roads were found in good condition. From McCloud to Redding, however, they were rather bad. From Redding on they were in excellent shape.

It is a safe assertion that nothing has occurred in the motor world that will create more interest among motorists and business men who have heavy trucking to do than the work of the White Gasoline Three Ton truck on the road from Madera to the mill of the Madera Sugar Pine Company. This truck on its demonstration trip made the round trip in 18½ hours. On the up-trip it was loaded with 6,100 pounds of iron, 200 pounds of miscellaneous freight, and three men, approximately a load of 6,700 pounds, and on the return trip brought down 5,240 pounds of lumber and is accomplishing the same work daily on regular trips.

Mr. B. F. Horner, one of Alameda County's supervisors and a resident of Centerville, has just taken delivery of a model "M" six-cylinder forty horsepower Thomas runabout, which is one of the most novel cars yet seen in local autoing circles. The machine seats two passengers and has the rear of its body, which is used solely as a storage room for tires and other supplies, designed after the torpedo type. This is the sixth consecutive year that Mr. Horner has purchased Thomas cars. His first car was bought in 1905 and each year he purchases a new model. He is very enthusiastic about this new car and believes it to be the best motor and best design on the market.

Electric cars are daily becoming more popular for general use, writes a correspondent of the Pioneer Automobile Company. In the city of Chicago they are being used almost exclusively for ladies and for down-town work by business men. The cars most generally used are the Inside Drive Coupe style. The Pioneer Automobile Company report the sale of a six-cylinder Babcock to Mr. Gaber. This car looks very similar to a gasoline car, the arrangement for the driver being exactly the same. The car is due to arrive in San Francisco about July 10.

Mr. Joe Matson, the well known racing driver of the Chalmers team, spent a day in San Francisco recently en route to the Chalmers factory. He received a telegram to rush back, as he has been entered to drive one of the Chalmers touring cars in the Glidden Tour. Mr. Matson is most enthusiastic about the outlook on the entire coast where he spent the past five months. He hopes to return to the coast after he has finished with the Glidden Tour. He states that the Chalmers Company will double their capacity next season. Even then he believes there will be a shortage of cars on the coast.

SUMMONS TO ESTABLISH TITLE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—Action No. 21,812, Dept. No. 12.

MARY C. DEASY, sometimes known as MAY DEASY, Plaintiff, vs.
All Persons Claiming Any Interest in, or Lien Upon, the Real Property Herein Described, or Any Part Thereof, Defendants.

The People of the State of California: To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described, or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of MARY C. DEASY, sometimes known as MAY DEASY, plaintiff, filed with the clerk of the above entitled Court and City and County, within three months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City andCountyof San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

PARCEL No. 1.—Commencing at a point on the Westerly line of Twentieth Avenue, distant thereon One Hundred and Thirty-one (131) feet Northerly from the Northwesterly corner of Twentieth Avenue and California Street; thence running Northerly along said Westerly line of Twentieth Avenue Twenty-five (25) feet; thence at right angles Westerly One Hundred and Twenty (120) feet; thence at right angles Southerly Twenty-five (25) feet; and thence at right angles Easterly One Hundred and Twenty (120) feet to the point of commencement. Being a part of Block Number Ninety-one (91), Outside Lands.

PARCEL NO. 2.—Commencing at a point on the Westerly line of Noe Street, distant thereon Twenty-six (26) feet and Six (6) inches Southerly from the Southerly line of Hill Street; running thence Southerly and along the Westerly line of Noe Street Twenty-five (25) feet; thence at a right angle Westerly Eighty (80) feet; thence at a right angle Northerly Twenty-five (25) feet; thence at a right angle Easterly Eighty (80) feet to the Westerly line of Noe Street and the point of commencement. DOTTIE LILLIAN PARSONS, Plaintiff, vs.
EDWARD EUGENE PARSONS, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to Edward Eugene Parsons, Defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, on the ground of defendant's wilful desertion; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that , unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

Emporia is Heard From

"The Old Order Changeth" for the better, according to William Allen White, whose book, under the above title, is devoted to a view of present-day conditions and a retrospective cast at what went before. In our march of progress we have reached the point where the rights of man are beginning to take precedence over the rights of property; and equity as well as legality calls for recognition. Mr. White is opposed to the theory that we have anything resembling a war of the classes, rich against poor; capital against labor, or any other hard and fast demarcation, but he argues that the unrest, or whatever we may choose to call it is really taking place in the minds of men and that the general tendency towards good-will is the cumulative result of the thought of all men. He has not relied upon columns of figures and tables of statistics to prove his points, but has discoursed familiarly and easily as an observer who, occupying a point of vantage, is enabled to see a little more than his neighbors and passes his observations along. He points out the way in which business and business interests supplanted mankind with law makers and how mankind is now pushing business back into its legitimate, secondary place; but instead of adopting the attitude of the muckraker towards the nation-wide evils we have suffered to grow up he tells us plainly that laws are no better than the people who formulate and administer them, and as the individual citizen improves himself everything else will move forward in proportion. Mr. White still has an abounding faith in school-going. He calls it education and though he admits that the boy of fourteen who leaves his classes at that age is a drug in the market, a nondescript whom no one will willingly employ, he sees the remedy is still more schooling. A course which, after eight years, leaves a lad without purpose, devoid of application or industry, with a job-lot of tag-ends of this and that, not one of them long enough to tie to, if prolonged for four or eight years longer, will produce no good citizens. In point of fact it is not the shortness of the school period but the bootlessness of school methods of the present day which is to be criticized. A generation ago the boy who left the grammar school at fourteen knew how to obey an order, to be prompt in attendance, speedy in dispatch of errands and diligent in the pursuit of his tasks. He had a well-grounded fundamental store of useful knowledge and though he could not design a book-cover nor braid a shoestring watch guard nor dissect a grasshopper, he could perform simple operations in arithmetic, write a legible hand and express himself clearly if not with grace and elegance. He came out of school ready to catch on—to something besides a base ball or a tennis racket, and whether he took a short course at a business college where his father paid monthly or quarterly bills in hard dollars directly out of his pocket book instead of indirectly, at long range under the guise of taxes, and therefore looked for value received in the way of class percentages; or whether he began as an errand boy and worked up in some business house; or took up some manual trade while his fingers were still nimble enough to adjust themselves readily, he made good. If Mr. White and other writers would talk a little with just plain teachers instead of absorbing the views of educators they would learn something to their advantage in the matter of what is the matter with the school boy—and girl—of today. It is not too little schooling, but too much of the wrong kind—the kind which prolongs the period of irresponsible dependence, where every trivial occupation is performed with an eye on the clock and the one perpetual dread is that by some unforeseen accident some pupil may possibly do "too much," which has played the merry mischief with the morale of the young generation. Mr. White is so optimistic that he creates a wholesome reaction against the pessimism of the muckraker. We needed the change badly. It is a more wholesome diet, for "The Old Order Changeth" is not to be confused with the old-fashioned spread-eagleism which labeled all things American with the stencil mark of perfection. Published by the Macmillan Company.

A Rattling Good Yarn

Harold MacGrath's heroes and heroines are given to defying the conventions in the matter of formal introductions, so his readers will find nothing surprising in the fact of Jack Fitzgerald, special writer and sometimes war correspondent, being seized with a whim, as he sat idly at his club window, and forthwith buying out the stock of an Italian image vendor on a wager that he would make a more successful salesman than the original owner, nor in his finding in his first customer a charming young woman who, under pretence of giving him an address at which to deliver her purchase, dropped on his tray a card giving no clue to her identity but instead a mysterious message, command or entreaty to "Come to the house at the top of the hill in Dalton tomorrow night at eight o'clock. But do not come if you lack courage." Being well supplied with the commodity, it remained only to discover the whereabouts of Dalton and the means of reaching it, which Fitzgerald promptly did, and where his mysterious correspondent shortly introduced him to her father Rear-Admiral Killigrew, retired, as the private secretary she had engaged for him. However, the proceeding was less precipitate than it seemed for the Killigrews and Fitzgeralds were old friends, but since Fitzgerald pere had lost his fortune and the son had never pursued old acquaintances he had virtually forgotten all about the Killigrews until Laura, knowing him both by sight and by reputation, had taken this means of drawing him back within the fold. What Fitzgerald expected to be but a brief call proved to be an extended association for before he returned to his wonted occupation he had engaged in a treasure hunt which carried him half round the world, not to mention gaining an insight into the dark alleys of European politics which he, for all his experience, did not guess the existence of. A man whom he had met some time before when both were acting as war correspondents and whom he subsequently came upon again as the private secretary of his friend Rear-Admiral Killigrew, turned out to be fourth by illegitimate descent from the great Napoleon, and another, a harmless butterfly specialist was, when not engaged in the pursuit of his hobby, a secret agent for the French government, while one of the sailors on the Killigrew yacht was, for example, a royal duke. It need not be specified that there is a love story twining in and out amongst the mysteries and intrigues, nor that the hero and heroine come to anchor before the altar, and though the love chase proceeds without the usual obstacles there are unexpected developments enough before the treasure is finally appropriated, but it would be too bad to crack the nut and extract all the meat, thus depriving readers of their legitimate pleasure. "A Splendid Hazard" is a rattling good yarn of its kind, nothing profound or brain-racking, but just a story which, however it might disintegrate under microscope and chemical analysis, is convincing enough while it lasts, and that, after all, is the test. Harold MacGrath never pretends to do more than produce a bit of light, entertaining fiction for our off hours and he succeeds better in his aim than do nine-tenths of those who offer us disguised tracts or, under pretence of presenting moral problems, simply dabble in filth. Published by the Bobbs-Merrill Co., with illustrations by Howard Chandler Christy.

THE BAY CITIES WATER COMPANY--- THE DEVELOPMENT OF YEARS

To the property owners of the East Bay Cities our contracts mean simply an unusual opportunity to secure better and cheaper water.

But to our engineers it means the consummation of years of work; it represents the expenditure of millions of dollars; it is the outward and visible evidence of one of the greatest engineering propositions ever undertaken in the West.

No military demonstration was ever more carefully planned than the campaign we are now making for the water business of the East Bay Cities. It began years ago with the purchase of the first watershed, and it has progressed gradually but surely, until today the Bay Cities Water Company possesses a system of water properties not equaled by any other water company in the world.

Years have been spent in testing the capacity of these sheds. We make no statements, no promises, no guarantees that have not been tested by the acid of time.

We are now offering this vast supply of pure water to the property owners of the East Bay Cities. We offer to sell it at a price that will mean a saving to them of $500,000 a year. We offer to put in four-inch distributing pipes, six-inch hydrant mains and guarantee a water pressure sufficient to meet every emergency. We guarantee ample fire protection and a water supply that is practically inexhaustible.

To bring our system here and into the streets of your city will mean an outlay reaching close to $15,000,000—most of which will be spent in Alameda County. The money is ready; our men are ready; we begin work when our contracts aggregate 5,000,000 gallons a day.

Since the eighties the water business has been a hotbed of political scandal. Sign a Bay Cities Water Company's contract and you eliminate politics from the water situation for ten years.

In our contracts the rates are plainly stated. They provide for an automatic reduction as the demand grows.

These yearly wrangles over the water rates cost money. They inevitably result in law suits which cost more money. And the property owner pays for it all, coming and going.

Sign a Bay Cities Water Company's contract and eliminate politics from the water business.

Taft and Insurgency

The adherents of the Taft Administration are in a much less lugubrious frame of mind than they were a month ago. Indeed they have become somewhat cheerful and optimistic, the reason being that the portents of political calamity that darkened the horizon but a short time ago are vanishing. Public sentiment regarding the Administration is undergoing a change. President Taft is waxing in public favor, and the indications are that the insurgents have shot their bolt. Recent achievements in Congress, whch it is unnecessary to mention, have served to extinguish the motive of insurgency and render the pretexts of partisan clamor illogical and obviously illusory. The regulars have been taking the wind out of the sails of the enemy's craft. The insurgents have been out-maneuvered. Besides the dear old purblind public has been getting surfeited with aggressive, self-righteous patriotism. No continuous performance however inspiring can fail to pall in time. Even Cannonism has petered out in the matter of its potentialities. A few months ago the whole country was anathematizing Uncle Joe and all that he vaguely symbolized. The psychology of the public attitude toward Cannonism was akin to that of the hundred thousand bucolic Englishmen that Defoe tells about. They were ready to fight to the death against popery without knowing whether popery was a man or a horse. The people that fretted themselves into a lather over Cannonism have permitted their emotions to subside. Likewise the people that believed the tariff was the handiwork of Satan in his capacity of special representative of "the interests." And as for the people that were burning with solicitude for the Roosevelt policies it has suddenly dawned on them that while they were frothing at the mouth out of sympathy with the acute paroxysms of "Battle Bob" La Follette and the other E. P. E. Troys of the national circus Mr. Taft was engaged in carrying out his pledges. So there is hardly anything left to supply the insurgents with inspiration. Most of the people who have given an eager ear to the ravings of the muckrakers are realizing that there is more in President Taft to admire than to reprobate. To use a homely expression, President Taft wears well. Somewhat handicapped from the start, succeeding as he did a statesman who was more of a god than a man according to the popular conception, it was easy for his critics to create the impression that he abounded in shortcomings and imperfections. It was demanded of Mr. Taft that he prove himself a superman, the peer of one whom the people had apotheosized. He was expected to change his nature, to constitute himself the supreme judge of his fellow man, to substitute the Code Roosevelt for the Decalogue, to hold the imagination thrall not only with fine sentiments and mouth-filling platitudes but also with performances as picturesque as those of the Grand Cyruses of the old romances who made their way to their mistresses' hearts by slaying giants and taming dragons. Mr. Taft is entirely lacking in the temperament essential to these accomplishments. But he abounds in the homespun virtues which have been out of date for some years and which appear to be slowly coming into vogue again. Mr. Taft appears to be above all things a manly man. As free from cant as from the spirit of suspicion, his nature is pervaded with a kindliness which charms away animosities by its unaffected courtesy. The great elements in his conduct are his loyalty to his friends and the remarkable simplicity which characterizes his moral nature, his intellect and his purposes. We are told that his friends are not deserving of his loyalty. This may be true. But one of the strongest tests of true friendship is that which can be applied only through the medium of the undeserving. That President Taft has been imposed upon, however, or that as a consequence the interests of the people have suffered, are questions which we are less disposed to leave to the judgment of the muckrakers than to Time, "the sole philosopher, as all beside are sophists." But whatever the truth we believe that President Taft is overcoming prejudice, and that it will be seen later on that considering the critical complications of one of the most embittered situations in the history of American politics, he has handled himself with admirable fortitude and not without foresight and judgment.

The Editorial Prerogative

At times we have wondered whether certain illustrious pundits of the press appreciate the enormous advantage which they have over ordinary mortals in the domain of disputation. The persons to whom we have especial reference are those whose methods of discussion indicate a consciousness of mastery over every situation due to a singular prestige born of infallibility. An editor of this class is not like an attorney who expects to be answered by opposing counsel; nor is he like the honorable gentleman on the floor of the House who must never lose sight of the fact that a debate is not a monologue. Rather is he like the writer of imaginary conversations who builds up men of straw at his pleasure, contriving for them the most palpable sophistries and swelling with pride as he topples them over. Rioting in gratuitous assertion, he defies the drudgery of thought, but solves the most abstruse problems by jumping from premiss to conclusion without ever deigning to follow to remote developments any particular line of meditation. At all times he is Sir Oracle, in axioms not less fertile than Sancho Panza. And all of his axioms, however absurd, he sets forth with a gigantic self-confidence, not to say colossal self-conceit, giving the reader the impression that they are to be verified by experience just as you can verify that fire burns and bread nourishes. Among the gentlemen in this blissful state of mind is the editor of Collier's Weekly. This amazing personage writes as though he knows everything intuitively. Apparently he has no doubts about anything. For every why he has a wherefore. He believes that for anything to become axiomatic it is but necessary for him to give it the weight of his authority. After a man has worked himself into this state of mind it is easy for him to write editorials. He feels that there is no necessity for him to demonstrate anything concerning which he desires to produce a conviction. Sufficient for his readers, in his opinion, is his ipse dixit; argument is superfluous; facts and circumstances, of no value whatsoever. That such is the editor of Collier's view of his powers may be learned from the easy manner in which he handles several propositions in a recent editorial. One of the propositions is that the Republican party is encouraging Socialism through the medium of the protective tariff, "the end of which is to turn this into a nation of two kinds of people, factory owners at the top and factory workers at the bottom." Another of the propositions is that the tariff "tends to destroy the agricultural class of small property owners." How the editor learned these things we are not permitted to know. We are not even vouchsafed a hint as to the mental processes by which he resolved these propositions and produced conviction of their soundness in his own mammoth mind. They are given to us as though they were divine revelations which we are to accept among the many things unseen that are a test of faith. Incidentally we are told that Socialists "preach pure reason and try to keep the public eye focused on the ultimate ends of logic." This is a proposition that savors of mysticism. In all probability it is irrefutable. But we are not able to judge of its soundness because we are utterly unable to guess what it means. Of the same school of philosophy as the editor of Collier's is a young man who writes editorials for the Examiner. Commenting on Labor Commissioner McKenzie's report on Oriental immigration he tells us that the gentleman voices the desires of only railroad and steamship companies, the big fruit growers and the big wheat growers. He adds that thirty-one years ago the people of California voted against Chinese immigration and that they stand today where they stood in 1879. He holds therefore that the McKenzie report is unworthy of consideration. Thus is the whole matter disposed of. How or where the editor got the facts that justify his conclusion we are not told. Presumably it is unnecessary for us to know. Presumably it is for us to consider the authority impeccable and infallible. It is by reason of the faith that we have in the clairvoyant powers of these moulders of public opinion that we are gradually becoming fit to govern ourselves without the aid of institutions such as were created by our obsolete Constitution.

Senator Leavitt's High Crimes

For a fine illustration of the arrogance, bigotry and stupidity that are responsible for much of the personal abuse with which the columns of our daily newspapers teem read the article by which the Bulletin seeks to justify the scurrilous attack on Senator Leavitt which is now the basis of a libel suit. The Bulletin article presents a summary of Senator Leavitt's acts as a member of the Legislature. The article is in the nature of an indictment, specifying as crimes against the commonwealth such officials acts of Senator Leavitt as were contrary to the Bulletin's sentiments regarding legislation. It is not charged that Senator Leavitt acted from corrupt motives, but clearly enough it is desirable that the inference of venality be drawn from the circumstance that while the Senator happened to be as opinionated as the Bulletin's editor their opinions were diametrically opposed. It appears that Leavitt voted against the direct primary bill. For this he is charged with having betrayed the interests of the people. Now intelligent and educated men, whatever be their opinion regarding the direct primary, admit that there are two sides to the question as to whether this democratic device is beneficial to the people. So distinguished a scholar as Nicholas Murray Butler and so eminent an attorney as Joseph Choate, ex-Ambassador to England, neither of whom has ever been suspected of being antagonistic to the interests of the nation, are of the opinion that the direct primary does more harm than good. But if these gentlemen had been members of the Legislature when the direct primary was under discussion, the Bulletin to be consistent would have been impelled to impugn their honesty. And doubtless like Senator Leavitt they would have incurred the Bulletin's disinterested hostility by reason of their attitude toward the recall and on the question of the advisability of making it possible for a man accused of crime to obtain a change of venue in the event of his being up against a personally conducted judge. The fact of the matter is that it is extremely difficult for any honest man with the courage of his convictions to reconcile his opinions on public question with those of a demagogic editor. And certainly it seems unreasonable that one should be expected either to do so or to suffer himself to be abused like a pick-pocket. Yet these are precisely the alternatives between which not only Senator Leavitt but all men in public life must make their choice. For the press is worse than a great bully; it is a great bigot. All editors are not intolerant from sinister motives, but even many honest editors who have become habitually dogmatical and censorious, are like the buffalo who sees right forward, nothing on the right or the left. They cling to opinions adopted without investigation, defend them without argument, and see no virtue or truth but on their own side. It is because of this temperament, because of the furious bigotry of a despotic press that most men in public office must either lose their self-respect by abandoning their convictions or their reputation by sticking to them.

The Dread of Germs

Every day we are becoming more keenly sensible of the imminent dangers that lurk in the most commonplace utilities. Every day we are told of some new transient habitation of the deadly germ that longs for a retreat in our vitals. According to the doctors the human species is beset with germs, and were we to heed the scientific alarmists we should spend so much of our time taking precautions against death we should have no time to live. Now we are not disposed to question the truth of what the doctors tell us. When they are talking about germs they are talking about something they have studied. It is but fair to credit them with familiarity with the fauna of the human system as well as with all the insidious enemies of our species. So when they warn us against street car straps and advocate the use of a substitute less hospitable to germs we listen respectfully to their admonitions and appreciate their professional judgment. Indeed we are prepared to agree with them in the event of their recommending a self-fumigating substance as a substitute for our paper money which they have pronounced pregnant with the subtle instrumentalities of the Grim Reaper. If in the course of time they recommend the enactment of a law either prohibiting handshaking altogether or requiring precautionary sterilization they shall not meet with opposition from us. Realizing our utter inability to physic ourselves the doctors will always have our hearty co-operation. But with all due deference to a noble profession we will venture the suggestion that as a consequence of the dread of germs becoming somewhat of an obsession the doctors are shortening our lives by their eagerness to prolong them. We suspect them of having created a new disease—a compound of anxiety and fear. They are tyrannizing over our imagination, raising phantoms of dread, inflicting us with supernumerary distresses. It certainly exhausts the nerves of timid people to be constantly on the qui vive for man-eating germs while being almost certain that there is no possibility of escape. From what the doctors tell us we might as well conclude that there is nothing worth while in life but new schemes of sanitation. The creed of the doctors is to make the most of life on a sterilized basis with a germicide ready to hand. As a matter of fact most of the critical things in this "little gleam of time between two eternities" never happen; yet worrying about them causes more disease than all the ravenous bugs with which the prospect of life is said to swarm. It would be much better for us if instead of going about encased in an armor of prophylactics we induced philosophic calm by reflection on the experience of Aristophanes. Warned that he was to be killed on a certain day by the accidental falling of something on his head he decided to disappoint fate by leaving town and spending the day in the fields under the blue skies. As he was sauntering along an eagle flying overhead with a turtle in its talons dropped its prey. The turtle fractured the poet's skull and he wrote no more.

The Vision

This poem written by Louis A. Robertson, who died in this city last week, is here printed for the first time. It was written in the sanitarium where death liberated him from the iron grasp of a disease that had tortured him for eighteen years

One night when slumber mocked my sleepless eyes,
And silence reigned within my little room,
I saw an angel's face before me rise,
Her beauty glorified the midnight gloom.

She said to me, "Though we have lived apart
For long and lonely years, our God above
Knows that I throned thee in a faithful heart,
And prayed for thee with loyal lips of love.

My virgin vows I kept until the last
Faint breath of life parted my lips in prayer,
Then over seas and lands I swiftly passed
To find thee doomed to sorrow and despair.

'Tis scarce a moment since my spirit heard
The Voice that summoned me away from earth;
'Twas in a long and lethal swoon the word
Of God gave me my beatific birth.

He gave, as well, the vision that defies
All time and space, for I beheld afar
Majestic planets circling in the skies
Around the throne of God which is a star.

And then I heard the sweet and solemn voice
Of Him who wept in dark Gethsemane;
Ah, how it made my ransomed soul rejoice
With an unutterable love for thee.

He said the sacred and terrestrial troth
That shrined thee, dearest, in my aching heart,
Would gain God's saving mercy for us both,
And bring thee soon to me no more to part."

She paused and looked on me, then drawing near,
I felt upon my brow her fragrant breath;
She banished from my heart all doubt and fear,
And shrived my soul for my redeeming death.

Perspective Impressions

Young Theodore Roosevelt appears to abhor the limelight as heartily as his father loves it.

Representative Hayes has been again found out, but he is by no means abashed. Repudiated by the machine, distrusted by the reformers, nevertheless he will continue to play both ends against the middle with his old-time enthusiasm.

"I want to tell you," says Senator La Follette, "that Colonel Roosevelt is the greatest living American." For his magnanimity in thus renouncing first place "Battle Bob" deserves the plaudits of the whole Chautauqua Circle.

The Dean of Norwich has taken the pains to give the world his assurance that King George is not a drunkard but "a man of intense self-sacrific and high character." It is now in order for somebody to say a few words for the Dean of Norwich.

Quite as revolting as the depravity of the Berkeley tutor who was arrested in this city last week is the pornography that he inspired.

There will be many sane celebrations of Independence Day this year, but the only one that will be accorded much space in the dailies the morning after is to be pulled off at Reno.

Millionaire Bradbury says that prison experience has opened his eyes. This was to be expected. But it has also opened his purse for the benefit of paroled prisoners. This is almost miraculous.

Hiram Johnson will probably have no difficulty in acquitting his client Dr. Williard P. Burke now that the principal witness for the prosecution has gone to China. The supposition is that she got away without Hiram's knowledge, so preoccupied has he been with politics.

The Broderick Funeral Oration

Delivered by Col. Edward D. Baker

(In last week's Town Talk was published an account of the duel between Judge Terry and Senator Broderick and of the consequent death of the latter. The speech published today was delivered by Colonel Baker on September 18, 1859, over the dead Senator when his body lay in state in the Union Hotel on Portsmouth Square. Colonel Baker was one of the golden-tongued orators of California. Born in England in 1811 he was brought to the United States by his father in 1816 and lived successively in Philadelphia, Indiana, Illinois and St. Louis. Having inherited a passion for books young Baker studied law in St. Louis and was admitted to the bar. He served throughout the Black Hawk War and afterwards entered politics in Illinois, gaining considerable distinction on account of his ability as an orator and rising by degrees to the congressional dignity. He raised a regiment for the Mexican War and at its close went back to Congress. In 1852 he removed to San Francisco where he again won distinction as an orator, lecturer and political speaker. From here he went to Oregon and was chosen United States Senator, but the Civil War breaking out he again took the field as a brigadier general of volunteers. He was killed at Ball's Bluff on October 21, 1861. His body was brought to San Francisco and interred in Lone Mountain Cemetery. On the day of his funeral business was suspended in this city on account of the general mourning and immense throngs followed his casket to its resting place.—Editor's Note.)

Citizens of California: A Senator lies dead in our midst! He is wrapped in a bloody shroud, and we, to whom his toils and cares were given, are about to bear him to the place appointed for all the living. It is not fit that such a man should pass to the tomb unheralded; it is not fit that such a life should steal unnoticed to its close; it is not fit that such a death should call forth no rebuke, or be followed by no public lamentation. It is this conviction which impels the gathering of this assemblage. We are here of every station and pursuit, of every creed and character, each in his capacity of citizen, to swell the mournful tribute which the majesty of the people offers to the unreplying dead. He lies today surrounded by little of funeral pomp. No banners droop above the bier, no melancholy music floats upon the reluctant air. The hopes of high-hearted friends droop like fading flowers upon his breast, and the struggling sigh compels the tear in eyes that seldom weep. Around him are those who have known him best and loved him longest; who have shared the triumph, and endured the defeat. Near him are the gravest and noblest of the State, possessed by a grief at once earnest and sincere; while beyond, the masses of the people whom he loved and for whom his life was given, gather like a thunder-cloud of swelling and indignant grief.

In such a presence, fellow-citizens, let us linger for a moment at the portals of the tomb, whose shadowy arches vibrate to the public heart, to speak a few brief words of the man, of his life, and of his death.

Mr. Broderick was born in the District of Columbia in 1820. He was of Irish descent, and of obscure and respectable parentage; he had little of early advantages, and never summoned to his aid a complete and finished education. His boyhood and his early manhood were passed in the City of New York, and the loss of his father early stimulated him to the efforts which maintained his surviving mother and brother, and served also to fix and form his character even in his boyhood. His love for his mother was his first and most distinctive trait of character, and when his brother died—an early and sudden death—the shock gave a serious and reflective cast to his habits and his thoughts, which marked them to the last hour of his life.

He was always filled with pride, and energy, and ambition. His pride was in the manliness and force of his character, and no man had more reason than he for such pride. His energy was manifest in the most resolute struggles with poverty and obscurity, and his ambition impelled him to seek a foremost place in the great race for honorable power.

Up to the time of his arrival in California, his life had been passed amid events incident to such a character. Fearless, self-reliant, open in his enmities, warm in his friendships, wedded to his opinions, and marching directly to his purpose through and over all opposition, his career was checkered with success and defeat; but even in defeat, his energies were strengthened and his character developed. When he reached these shores, his keen observation taught him at once that he trod a broad field, and that a higher career was before him. He had no false pride; sprung from a people and of a race whose vocation was labor, he toiled with his own hands, and sprang at a bound from the workshop to the legislative hall. From that time there congregated around him and against him the elements of success and defeat—strong friendships, bitter enmities, high praise, malignant calumnies; but he trod with a free and a proud step that onward path which has led him to glory and the grave.

It would be idle for me, at this hour and in this place, to speak of all that history with unmitigated praise; it will be idle for his enemies hereafter to deny his claim to noble virtues and high purposes. When in the Legislature, he boldly denounced the special legislation which is the curse of a new country, he proved his courage and his rectitude. When he opposed the various and sometimes successful schemes to strike out the salutary provisions of the Constitution which guarded free labor, he was true to all the better instincts of his life. When, prompted by ambition and the admiration of his friends, he first sought a seat in the Senate of the United States, he aimed by legitimate effort to attain the highest of all earthly positions, and failed with honor.

It is my duty to say that, in my judgment, when at a later period he sought to anticipate the senatorial election, he committed an error which I think he lived to regret. It would have been a violation of the true principles of representative government, which no reason, public or private, could justify, and could never have met the permanent approval of good and wise men. Yet, while I say this over his bier, let me remind you of the temptation to such an error, of the plans and reasons which prompted it, of the many good purposes it was intended to effect. And if ambition, "the last infirmity of noble minds," led him for a moment from the better path, let me remind you how nobly he regained it.

It is impossible to speak within the limits of this address of the events of that session of the Legislature at which he was elected to the Senate of the United States; but some things should not be passed in silence here. The contest between him and the present Senator had been bitter and personal. He had triumphed. He had been wonderfully sustained by his friends, and stood confessedly "the first in honor and the first in place." He yielded to an appeal made to his magnanimity by his foe. If he judged unwisely, he has paid the forfeit well. Never in the history of political warfare has any public man been so pursued; never has malignity so exhausted itself.

Fellow-citizens! the man whose body lies before you was your Senator. From the moment of his election his character has been maligned, his motives attacked, his courage impeached, his patriotism assailed. It has been a system tending to one end—and the end is here. What was his crime? Review his history—consider his public acts—weigh his private character,—and before the grave incloses him forever, judge between him and his enemies.

As a man—to be judged in his private relations—who was his superior? It was his boast, and amid the general license of a new country, it was a proud one, that

The Cult of Bacchus

By Major Ben C. Truman

If there had never been such things as alcoholic drinks within the reach of human kind perhaps it would have been better—perhaps there would have been much less misery even if far less joy. But, inasmuch as there has been a preference for wines and liquors from prehistoric times to the present day the subject will undoubtedly forever be one of inquiry and discussion and pretty general endorsement.

The Old Testament and the New, while they teem with counsel against immoderation of various kinds, have not a word condemnatory of the products of the wine press, properly used. As early in the Bible as Exodus (xxii.-29): "Thou shalt not delay to offer the first of thy ripe fruits and of thy liquors" may be found. In Deuteronomy (xxxiii.-26-28): "And in this mountain shall the Lord of hosts make unto all people a feast of fat things, a feast of wines on the lees, of fat things full of marrows, of wines on the lees well refined." Isaac says to Jacob in Isaiah (xxv.-6): "Therefore, God give thee of the dew of heaven and the fatness of the earth, and plenty of corn and wine." And in Proverbs (ii.-9-10) Solomon says: "So shall thy barns be filled with plenty and thy presses shall burst out with new wine." Surely, if Christ ever performed a miracle it was when he turned ninety gallons of water into wine at the wedding feast of Cana of Galilee; while it is known that Saint Paul said to Timothy: "Take a little wine for thy stomach's sake." I might present no end of Biblical quotations to show that stimulants are repeatedly used therein as a symbol of God, and of His goodness and love to man. Isaiah employs wine as the symbol of salvation in the following famous passage: "Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money, come ye, buy and eat; yea, come, buy wine and milk without money and without price."

It is also proven by the Bible that men and women became drunken who used the wines and liquors of earlier days immoderately just as stimulants immoderately used by men and women in our own time often lead to intoxication. To carry their point and stay generally by the Bible, it has been stoutly claimed by Prohibitionists that the wines spoken of in the Bible were not really fermented liquors at all, but simply the unfermented juice of the grape. But there are scores upon scores of quotations, both from the Old and New Testaments, which show clearly that the Bible wines were, in fact, intoxicating drinks. The drunkenness of Noah, as related in Genesis, (ix., 20-25), and of Lot (Genesis, xix., 30-35), the testimony of Eli and Hannah (I. Samuel, i., 12-15), of Nabal (I. Samuel, xxv., 36, 37), and of Absalom (II. Samuel, xiii., 28), are proofs positive that in Biblical days wines made drunk men and women who used them to excess, just as surely as in our day. It is, indeed, difficult, in view of the almost endless array of passages in the Bible on this point, to comprehend how any honest student can doubt that the wines of the Bible were intoxicants, because in many of these passages drunkenness is expressly named and described. In Proverbs, for instance, we read this warning against intoxication: "The drunkard and glutton shall come to poverty"; and the prophet Isaiah shows that he knew that the wines of his time were not innocuous, for he says (xxix., 9, 10): "Stay yourselves and wonder; cry ye out and cry; they are drunken, but not with wine; they stagger, but not with strong drink." Evidently Isaiah had seen inebriate men act in his day just as they sometimes do in ours.

It was in the Prophet's time as in our own:—in the moderate use of alcoholic drinks joy and healthfulness; in their immoderate use sorrow and impaired life. There has never been any room for disagreement at least upon the manifold evils of intemperance. Every intelligent observer is deeply sensible of them. They have been stated over and over again in forms far more impressive than they can be presented here.

But the whole world indulges in intoxicating drinks. There is no place without them upon the habitable globe. And women, as well as men, from empresses to outcasts, stimulate the life-pulse, from the cradle to the grave. In mother's milk the babe takes ale, beer, or wine, for thus the nursing parent conscientiously nourishes herself. Weddings and wakes and birthday anniversaries are alike seasons when men and women baptize the stomach with spirit or vinous stimulus. Jewish weddings are notably convivial; and the most beautiful part of the ceremony which unites the bride and groom is the tasting of wine from the same goblet—signifying that they will drink together from the cup of joy or sorrow.

If we were to believe all the cranks and reformers who write and lecture, then we should be compelled to forswear all the foods and liquids of the world, and our orb would become uninhabitable and enter rapidly the phase of a dead star; for thousands have written as violently against the immoderate use of iced, aerated and other waters as have those who have written against liquors and wines. Quite as violent are opponents of tea and coffee as are those who oppose the moderate use of malt, vinous and spirituous liquors. There are those who forbid meats of all kinds; others would dispense altogether with cereals; and there are multitudes who eschew saccharine and starch even to an infinitesimal allotment, and insist that the whole human family should do the same. To be sure, as violently as have all these good things of life been denounced—by men and women of educational attainments as eagerly as by demagogues and cranks, and by that most hideous of all creatures, the (so-called) "reformed drunkard'—excessive eating and ice-water gulping have ruined more stomachs and sent more human beings to premature graves. Indeed, the world's statistics undeniably give the steady and even excessive consumers of spirituous drinks the trophies in the score of longevity.

Still, as noble, convivial and pleasant as John Barleycorn proverbially is, we should bear in mind that we must at all times be moderate in our associations with him, and also remember the incomparable example set us by that temperate and long-lived Venetian, Luigi Cornaro; and also by Martin Luther, who, after services Sundays, used to drink beer moderately with his brethren in the gardens of Wittenberg.

Corn or Rye whiskey is the standard drink of Americans, either plain or in the shape of julep, punch, cobler, toddy, nogg, fizz and cocktail, although they indulge in other whiskies and in nearly all other drinks known, and especially in champagne, ale and beer. But whiskey is the standard tod, through rainy or sunshiny weather, in sorrow or joy. Many American gentlemen keep fine brandies on their sideboards, but whiskey is the safer tod of the two, and has less headachy effects "the next morning." Peach-and-honey and apple toddy are favorite drinks in Kentucky, Missouri, Tennessee and Alabama in winter. Tom-and-Jerry is served all over the United States during cold weather. It is a pleasant compound, and was invented by an Englishman who used to keep a place in New York seventy years ago.

There are many kinds of toddies—hot, cold, "soft," "dry," "sour," etc., made of rum, gin, brandy and whiskey. These are drunk all over the country, and are considered exceed-

The Countess Camille

By Francis Grierson

I had heard of her at the Embassy in Vienna, and when I was promoted to a more important post at St. Petersburg I had the good fortune to meet her on several occasions, but always at a reception or a ball, and on each occasion it seemed as if I had met her for the first time. She was known in society as the Countess Camille, and I had not yet succeeded in learning anything more definite about her family relations.

The Countess Camille was invariably accompanied by a little German baroness, who was a good linguist, and who acted as her companion. I had known the Baroness a long time, and at last concluded that she herself did not know the true history of the Countess.

And so it was.

One day I stood at the station in St. Petersburg, waiting to board the train for Paris, when two ladies approached; they were both enveloped to the eyes in furs, the weather being still cold for the middle of April, and as they came nearer I recognized the mysterious Countess and her German companion.

"Ah!" she exclaimed, greeting me, "how delightful! Let us travel together, at least part of the way; I always dislike traveling in a compartment set aside for ladies."

"That would be charming, " I remarked, and as the train was about to start I assisted her in, with the little Baroness following. We were the only occupants of the compartment, and were soon settled in our places, and by tipping the guard I made sure that no one else would intrude on our privacy. We talked of the weather, of the past season at St. Petersburg, of the opera, and many other things, the Baroness chiming in now and then with her nervous, tremulous voice, dotting our conversation here and there with exclamations and interrogations.

And now I observed every look and movement of the Countess Camille. There was no denying the extraordinary beauty, half Oriental, half Russian, of the woman seated before me. I had seen no face like it, even in Russia, where one sees so many women of a strangely complex type of beauty. Every time I looked at this woman, enveloped in furs of the rarest black fox, I received a fresh impression of bewilderment and mystery, and I felt that peculiar indefinable influence that radiates from certain natures born to mystify and to fascinate. I tried to guess her age, but in the maze of conflicting impressions I soon gave it up.

After a good deal of light talk, she opened a small satchel and took out a phial that glittered with all sorts of gems set in fantastic shapes, with arabesque characters engraved between the delicate spiral work of the stones. I did not realize the rare and peculiar beauty of this phial until the Countess held it up, opened the outer stopper by pressing a spring that sounded with a sharp click, and then a tiny inner stopper, and taking the handkerchief of the Baroness, slowly measured out one drop of the fluid and no more. It took a long time, first because of the small quantity required, second because of the thick oil-like quality of the fluid. Thus I had ample time to examine the exterior composition of the phial, and to note the fact that not more than one drop of its contents fell on the handkerchief.

"This is a souvenir of my sojourn in the Orient," said the Countess, with some languor, which I thought not unmixed with a suggestion of care and ennui.

Wonder and delight shone from the face of the Baroness; she seemed to have lost the power of speech, but at last she exclaimed: "Its effect is intoxicating! The odor puts one into a dream!"

The Countess gave a slight nod of assent as she began nonchalantly to fold a cigarette. For the moment I was so amused at the child-like amazement of the Baroness that I was hardly conscious of the potent effect being produced on my own senses by the odor from that one drop of golden elixir. I recognized in its ingredients the attar of roses and a slight tinge of musk, but more I could not make out, although I guessed in silence for a long time, calling to my mind all the rarest scents which I had known in my travels through Asia.

"And now," said the Baroness, still under the stimulus of the odor which seemed to vivify the very air we breathed, "perhaps you will tell us something about Constantinople, for we may never again have an opportunity like this."

The Countess Camille opened her pelisse at the neck, and at that moment I noticed a marked change in the expression of her face. I seemed to see her as another person. Her large, almond-shaped eyes looked darker and deeper than before, and her face became diffused with a slight crimson glow, which gave to her complexion a magnetic brilliancy that was dazzling. Surely this was a face that might turn the heads of statesmen, diplomats, and men of genius, and I congratulated myself that I was not in danger of succumbing to the magic of her perfumes, her jewels, her magnetic looks, and her winsome gestures. At last she said, addressing her companion:

"You have known me some time, and no doubt you have heard strange rumors about my early life."

"Certainly, Countess," said her companion, with a twinkle of expectation in her grey eyes.

"And yet you have only heard legends and old women's stories," said the Countess, as she made one of those bewitching gestures with her marvelous hand while shaking the ashes from her cigarette. "I will tell you some episodes in my early life, and you will soon see the difference between the legends and the reality.

"My father was a Russian and my mother an Austrian," she continued. "I was educated in a convent near Vienna, my mother having placed me there after my father's death. When my mother died, I was left in charge of my maternal aunt, who had full power to do with me as she pleased. I spent my nineteenth birthday at the convent, where all passed, as usual, in monotonous quiet, but the next day my aunt arrived and told me to dress myself in my best, as she was going to take me with her to Vienna.

"My aunt arrived early in the afternoon, in an old family coach, and within two hours' time we were on our way back to Vienna.

"She warned me to be as agreeable as possible to the high personage on whom we were about to call, and as convent life had given my face a serious expression I was told to smile, for, as you know, the Viennese like good humor and gaiety.

"Everything I saw from the carriage windows was new to my eyes, and when at last we got into the city, the bustle and noise almost stunned me. All seemed confusion; and the carriage rolled on and on, through narrow streets, across broad avenues, and again into dingy lanes, only to emerge for a moment and again enter narrow, winding streets. All this impressed me with singular force. My curiosity was now aroused as to the personage we were going to see. I wondered, in a vague way, what my aunt was going to do. At last, after crossing a bridge, we turned down an old street and soon into an old-fashioned court-yard. It was now growing dark, and lamps were being lighted. Servants appeared in brilliant liveries, and we were conducted, in a roundabout way, up a narrow flight of steps, then down a broad and magnificent staircase, then up again through

Gunst's Queer Codicil

The fact that State Senator Frank Leavitt of Alameda has brought suit against the Bulletin for $101,000, charging that he was libeled in a recent article denouncing his candidacy for renomination, serves to remind me of a very queer codicil which, I have been told, is part of the last will and testament of Mose Gunst. Mose Gunst in the days gone by when he was more of a figure in public life that he is now had reason to resent the license of some of our frontier newspapers and he adopted a curious method of recording his protest against this great evil. I am told on very good authority that he added a codicil to his will setting aside $5,000 for the legal defense of any person who should kill an editor for attacking him unjustly. I have known instances of newspaper proprietors leaving money for the defense of libel suits but this is the only legacy for inspiring editors with due caution in the wielding of their tremendous power of which I have ever heard. If Gunst's posthumous reminder to the newspapermen is upheld by the courts we shall observe a very decided improvement in the tone of editorial pronouncements.

A Great Reporter Here

John Slate of the New York World is at the St. Francis Hotel. Who is John Slate and why is he here? I can answer the first but not the second question. John Slate is the star man of the great Pulitzer paper. When there is the biggest kind of a detail to give to somebody on the World, Slate is the Somebody who gets that detail. As to why he is in San Francisco, I give it up. He is not out here to attend the Jeffries-Johnson fight for the big New York daily is already represented by its sporting editor, "Wurra Wurra" McLoughlin and the Evening World is also represented by its editor, "Bob" Edgren. Slate, I suppose, is out here on one of the important secret missions of his newspaper. Those missions in the past have taken him all over the world, so why not to San Francisco? One of Slate's biggest assignments and probably the most difficult was made when Pulitzer summoned him and said: "Mr. Slate, go and find John D. Rockefeller's father." It was at the time that Miss Ida Tarbell was publishing the life of John D. Rockfeller and her revelations as to the career of the oil king's parent suggested to Pulitzer the news value of an article dealing with his whereabouts and his opinion of his son. Slate worked for eighteen months on that detail and spent $60,000 and when he finally disentangled the clue to the elusive object of his hunt he found that the old man had been dead and buried for two months in the obscure part of Iowa where he lived under an assumed name. If Slate is looking for somebody in San Francisco I am perfectly sure that he will find him. Tremble, ye guilty in our midst!

Bowes' Financial Status

From Tacoma comes confirmation of my statement of last week that Ed Bowes' newspaper rating as a millionaire is not in strict accord with the rating which Dun or Bradstreet would give him if called upon for testimony. It looks as though Bowes is worse off than I thought. The land speculations in which he engaged with John H. Spring have not turned out well, owing to the fact that the Southern Pacific has not built its contemplated line from Portland to Tacoma. Instead of constructing a separate line the railroad has purchased a third interest in the Northern Pacific's main line between the two cities, thereby setting Bowes back, it is said, to the tune of about half a million. It is explained that owing to his losses his beautiful wife has resolved to forego the joys of her beloved domesticity and win a new stake from the box office. I am very sorry to hear that Bowes is in such difficulties, but knowing him as well as I do I haven't much doubt that he will eventually achieve a comfortable fortune on his own account.

The Problem of the Hour

Walter Parker of Los Angeles, a gentleman as distinguished for his wit and his alertness in repartee as for his generalship in politics was asked the other day if he did not consider it a curious anomaly that certain corporation-baiters in San Francisco who are continually shrieking about oppressive freight rates should be protesting against the reduction of rates between Los Angeles and Bakersfield. "Nothing curious about that," said Parker; "it only goes to show that the problem which inspires anti-railroad agitation is a local issue."

"Yes, I was fined $500 for putting coloring matter in artificial butter."

"Well, didn't you deserve it?"

"Perhaps. But what made me mad was that the judge who imposed the fine had dyed whiskers."

A Will Contest

During a symposium in the Palace Hotel the other day at which the gubernatorial contest was the subject of discussion an editor from the interior observed that the direct primary had brought about one of the most remarkable situations in the history of American politics. Asked to explain, he said that what seemed to be altogether a political contest was to a great extent a will contest. "Never before," he went on, "was the issue between special interests so clearly defined as it seems to be so far as two of the candidates in this campaign are concerned. Here we have Hiram Johnson running for Governor in behalf of Rudolph Spreckels and Charley Curry running for John D. Spreckels. Of course Curry is not John D. Spreckels's personal chattel, but unquestionably the Call's proprietor regards him as safe and sound for all purposes that may crystallize later on. They are warm friends. As to Hiram Johnson everybody who can glimpse things behind the scenes knows where he stands with reference to Rudolph, and the circumstance that Rudolph has absented himself from the State only serves to emphasize the truth for those to whom it is accessible." Continuing the gentleman from the interior observed that it was perhaps unnecessary to point out the circumstances in which a governor might be of great value to one side or the other in a will contest. He reminded his hearers, however, of the fact that when Jim Budd was Governor he made it possible for the Fair heirs to break their father's will.

Smashing Anderson

Early this week word was sent out from both the Johnson and Curry headquarters to concentrate forces against Alden Anderson. The news had come from the interior that sentiment in favor of Anderson was manifesting itself in unexpected places. A hurry call was sent out for some of Johnson's old friends of the graft prosecution, and during a conference it was decided to stem the Anderson tide with large chunks of editorial poison. It was the consensus of opinion that Anderson could be beaten if the impression could be created that it was for his benefit that Governor Gillett stopped the Jeffries-Johnson prize fight. So the editor of the Bulletin got busy at once and reeled off the desirable balderdash with the same facility with which a greased wad is rammed down a smooth bore rifle. A whole half page was devoted to the argument, and very large type was employed to ensure the weight that it was otherwise bound to lack. It is by such drivel that editors vindicate their faith in the feeble-mindedness of their readers.

The Passing of Mine Hostess

There is mourning in the Latin Quarter, for Rosa, the good wife of Mattias the restaurateur, has passed away. Some time ago Rosa was stricken with dropsy and her husband took her to Mexico, the land of her birth. She never rallied and died a short time ago. Mattias has returned to his little Mexican restaurant in Broadway, a very sad man. Once Mattias told a newspaper interviewer, "Me and Rosa fight like hell," but despite their quarrels, occasioned by the possession of hot Latin tempers, they loved each other deeply and sincerely and were seldom separated. So greatly has Mattias been affected by the death of his wife that he is already thinking of looking for surcease of sorrow in an extended trip abroad. If he goes he will probably put a sign on the door reading, "Gone to Europe; will be back in six months." It was in that casual fashion that Mattias announced his last departure from the city, much as another might announce his going out for lunch. On that last trip Rosa accompanied her husband; but this time he will go a widowed and heartsick man. How proud Rosa was of her husband and of his ability to speak nearly all the languages of Europe! Only once did she see him humiliated and that was when Haig Patigian, the sculptor, addressed him in Armenian and he could not answer. A beautiful woman Rosa was, with flashing black eyes, hair like the raven's wing and a figure that inspired many a Bohemian with poetical sentiments. It was her vivacious personality that went far to make Mattias' a famous resort. All over the world there are men and women who would say "God rest her" if they knew that Rosa had died.

The Success of Bob Davis

Robert H. Davis who used to hustle for news in this city has been so successful in New York that he is considered worth interviewing. To reach the heights where editors are anxious to exploit your personality is to be a Somebody in the metropolis and Bob Davis is undoubtedly a Somebody in magazinedom. From a half-page interview in the Telegraph I learn that he is the editor of the All Story, the Scrap Book and the Railroad Man's Magazine and associate editor of Munsey's, the Argosy and the Cavalier. This would indicate that Frank Munsey thinks rather highly of Bob; also that Bob has a large capacity for work. To the interviewer Davis told the story of his introduction to newspaper work in San Francisco. After working with his brother on the Carson City Appeal for some time Bob determined to go to San Francisco and told his father that he wasn't coming back until he wore a silk hat and creased trousers and had $1,000 in his pocket. The Carson City boys impressed on him the importance of dressing well so he bought a tan waistcoat embroidered with red horses jumping over green hurdles. "There were eight horses on my chest," he says, "and I felt like Lucky Baldwin on his stud farm. I went into the office of the city editor of the San Francisco Chronicle, and unconsciously, as the day was raw, my coat was buttoned. The city editor seemed to like me and gave me an assignment. I came in to write the story and took off my coat. There was a roar all over the office. 'I guess you don't want indoor work,' said the city editor. 'Come back in a year.' Maybe I was disheartened! I went to the Examiner and set type and after that I did reportorial work on all the San Francisco papers. I even started a magazine, Chic, getting all the best writers on my staff. I was strong for good stuff and pure English." Davis says he kept the promise he made his father about going back to Carson. He went there for the Corbett-Fitzsimmons fight with a silk hat, creased trousers and $2,700 in his pocket. Nobody knew him.

"Did you say that two artists had worked on your wife's portrait?"

"Yes, a portrait artist did her face and figure and a landscape painter her hat."

Abe Hummell's Tribute

Abe Hummell, the well-known New York lawyer, is enchanted with California. Having found San Francisco extremely to his liking he has gone south to test the beauties of Los Angeles, Pasadena and the rest of the resorts. Hummell was expressing his satisfaction with San Francisco to a group of local friends a few days ago and one statement he made impressed them particularly. "Gentlemen," he said, "I have traveled considerably in my time, but not in Venice, not in Constantinople, not among the Swiss lakes, nowhere in fact, have I ever seen such beautiful sunsets as the sunsets I watched on San Francisco bay when I was in quarantine at Angel Island."

setting of wide lawns at Market street and Auzerais avenue this old home is known to everybody in the Santa Clara Valley as the scene of many brilliant entertainments. History, political as well as social, was made in the old Murphy home in the days that are gone. For a long time it has been unoccupied and the ravages of decay are everywhere visible. The house is rickety with age, the grounds are weed-grown. Owing to the accumulation of debts in the Murphy estate it was necessary to sell it and it passed under the hammer last Saturday. As the property is very valuable the old landmark will probably be torn down and replaced by a row of flats or a business structure. A superstitious feeling is said to be one reason why the old home will not be rehabilitated. All those who dwelt within it met with misfortune. It was erected by Joel Mason, a wealthy mining man and politician, but he fell on evil days and sold it to Frank Huntsman, another mining man. Reverses came to Huntsman and he was forced to mortgage the home. When the mortgage was foreclosed it passed into the hands of James McCord, a rich man of this city. But McCord seemed to incur the hoodoo of the residence and he sold it to Martin Murphy, the father of Barney Murphy, the present owner. While the Murphys lived there the home was the social center of San Jose, but owing to his lavish spendings and his extensive charities Martin Murphy died a poor man. Barney Murphy too went through his money, principally on account of a tender heart that could not withstand the appeal of another's misfortune. The Murphy family has passed from its affluent estate and the visible sign of the family's wealth and hospitality and charity will soon be no more.

The Emmons Case Again

The amiable correspondent of the Stockton Mail whom I took to task for distorting the truth of the Emmons case acknowledges that he was in error, thus proving himself an exceptional journalist. But Judge Lawlor is incorrigible. He has returned to the charge. This time through the medium of the Examiner, which seeks to befriend him by holding the Court of Appeal up to ridicule for having pointed out the cunning trick by which he deprived Emmons of a fair trial. "The judge," says the Examiner, "read to the jury the exact language of the statute on which the right of the defendant is based." This in the judgment of the learned editor he had a right to do. Judge Lawlor's friend of the Examiner staff cannot conceive how wrong could be done by reading a statute. Thus he reasons: A statute is law; it is legal to read the law; therefore it was legal for Judge Lawlor to read the statute. By the same token it would be legal in the case of a man charged with an assault with a deadly weapon for the judge to read the section about murder in the first degree, and thus intimate that it was lucky for the defendant that he was not being tried for a more serious offense. The point in the Emmons case was that Judge Lawlor did not instruct the jury but rather that he sought to influence the jury by innuendo. He read a section of the code which states a rule of evidence, a section that was intended not for the guidance of juries but for the guidance of judges. If he had the right to read that section he also had the right to read the code on the subject of perjury for the purpose of conveying the impression that the defendant was afraid to assert his innocence under oath. In short, Judge Lawlor had as much right to read the whole code as the section which he did read. But let it not be supposed that Judge Lawlor doesn't know that he did wrong. The judge isn't an imbecile. He is much wiser than the editor whom he induced to write himself down an ass.

Estimating Our Losses

I asked an experienced hotelman how much he thought the city had lost in actual cash owing to the ban placed upon the Jeffries-Johnson fight and he said that a conservative estimate would place the figure at five million dollars. When I expressed some incredulity at the vastness of the sum he asked me if I knew that it was estimated that the steamer "Cleveland" which stayed in this port for six days with its 1500 passengers had left three million dollars here. I did not know this but he assured me that the estimate had been made by an authority on the subject. Going into details he said that the management of the St. Francis Hotel estimated its gross loss at $100,000 and that the Palace placed its loss at the same amount. The Fairmont, he said, had lost $75,000 gross and the Stewart $30,000 and the Grand $15,000. The losses of the other big hotels he placed at from $5,000 to $10,000. He also told me that the St. Francis alone had between 1100 and 1200 reservations for the week of the fight and that to accommodate its expected guests it would have been necessary to fill the ballroom, the mezzanine floor and other parts of the hotel not generally so used, with cots. He said that bartenders would have stood behind the bar shoulder to shoulder in order to accommodate the thirsty throngs.

Others Would Have Benefitted

This hotelman reminded me that the hotels would not have been alone in reaping the harvest had the fight taken place here. The restaurants would have gathered in mighty sums of which some of them are greatly in need just now. The theaters and the saloons would have been large beneficiaries. It was pointed out to me that most of the men coming from the East where heat prostrations are taking place every day would arrive here in the thinnest of clothing and that our cold winds and fogs would have sent them shivering to the clothiers and the haberdashers for more appropriate costumes. Of course there are many other ways in which money would have been spent during the week or ten days that the crowd would have remained here, but it is unnecessary to enter into further details. We have lost the fight and we have thereby lost a great deal of money, but sighing and weeping will not bring the fight back or conjure the gold pieces into our purses. As a matter of fact a great many of the wealthy sports who have crossed the continent to see the fight at Reno will come on to this city after the Fourth for a few days of enjoyment. So things are not really as bad as they might have been.

Sophocles vs. Shakespeare

Is Sophocles a greater drawing card than Shakespeare? Are the great critics of the country more interested in "Antigone" than in "As You Like It"? This question is suggested to me by the fact that when Miss Maude Adams played Rosalind for the first time in her career at the Greek Theater recently, none of the eastern critics came here for the performance, while on the other hand, for the "Antigone" performance of Miss Margaret Anglin, we have in town William Winter, the dean of American dramatic criticism, James O'Donnell Bennett, the distinguished Chicago critic, Miss Alice Kauser, the most successful play broker in the country and Percy Mackaye, the poet and playwright. That this quartet should cross the continent to see Miss Anglin in the Greek play might be taken as an indication that Sophocles is more highly regarded than the bard of Avon, but I do not see the matter in that light. It happens that Miss Margaret Anglin is under the management of Mr. Louis Nethersole and the four distinguished visitors are stopping at the St. Francis as the guests of Mr. Nethersole. That helps to explain matters. Before becoming a manager Mr. Nethersole was a press agent and his press agency was unsurpassed. As the publicity broker of his sister, the statuesque Olga, Louis made the country ring with the fame of the Sappho kiss—and that was only one of his achievements. As the result of the presence in the Greek Theater of two critics from the East, a New York play broker and a fine poet and playwright Mr. Nethersole will obtain for his star an amount of publicity which cannot be weighed in gold but which will have its effect on the box office receipts for many a day to come. Miss Adams' manager is Charles Frohman and he was evidently too busy with other ventures to attend to the item of publicity in connection with her appearance in Berkeley. But Louis Nethersole is never too busy for little details like that.

The Liberated Poet

For Louis A. Robertson, the poet, who died in this city last week, death was indeed the golden key that opened the palace of eternity. Nearly all the great poets experienced great sorrows. It is believed that the loftiest poetry was born of the profoundest griefs, and certainly the lives of Milton and Homer teach us that out of suffering have emerged the most sensitive souls. What grief overshadowed the lives of Dante and Petrarch! How intense was the mental anguish of the Psalmist! But where shall we find anything comparable with the woof of pain woven into the warp of Louis Robertson's melancholy life? A true poet was Robertson; some exquisite poetry was written in the sweat of his physical agony, but nothing that he has written excites such intensity of feeling as the awful tragedy of his career. And yet Robertson poured out his grief in lines that inspire the deepest emotion. Who, for example, can read the following stanzas that conjure up the poet himself in the awful gloom of his misery without having his soul stirred to the depths:

My world has shrunk at last to this small room,
Where like a prisoner I must now remain.
I'd rather be a captive in the gloom
Of some deep dungeon, tearing at my chain,
For then, perchance, my freedom I might gain.
Ah God! to think that I must languish here,
Shackeled by sickness and subdued by pain,
To die a living death from year to year,
Joy banished from my breast and Sorrow brooding there.

I often think how once these stumbling feet,
That nevermore can bear me to my bed,
Were swift to follow, as the wind is fleet,
The baleful beam that to destruction led;
Nor paused I till the lurid light had fled,
Till on my ears there broke the dismal roar
Of that dark stream whose waters wail the dead;
Dumb with despair I stood and from that shore
Saw Charon's ghostly craft and heard his doleful oar.

O Marah! Marah! as thy bitter stream
Was turned to sweetness by the magic tree,
So the dark current of my years doth seem
To flow at times in murmuring melody;
'Tis when, Inspiring Muse, I turn to thee;
Then the light laughing loves of other days
Hide their false faces, or like shadows flee;
Oft had I fallen in these cheerless ways,
But heard thy whispered lips that rescue and upraise.

Now though these limbs are cold and almost dead,
And torture runs through every sluggish vein,
Yet is endurance out of suffering bred,
And fortitude to triumph over pain;
The wasted body shrinks, but still the brain
Urges the palsied hand along the sheet,
On which, alas, tears sometimes fall like rain:
But Fancy, even Misery can cheat
And in the pain-born thought oft find a refuge sweet.

His Tragic Career

Through all the years of his terrible affliction Robertson never gave himself up wholly to despair. Suffering though he did the most excruciating torments, hope like a cordial inspirited his heart. He knew that he was in the grip of locomotor ataxia for life, but always he looked forward to the discovery of something that would ease his pain and sustain his strength. At times he was cheerful, and almost to the last he had hope of some day being able to sell his play "Montezuma," which he never tired of improving. He believed that this play would bring him money and enable him to defray his expenses. His needs were a constant source of anxiety to him intensifying his suffering a thousand fold. He was entirely dependent on the charity of friends, and for awhile, after the earthquake, he was neglected until James V. Coleman learned of his plight and came to his aid. It was Coleman that provided for the decent burial of Robertson, the same Coleman who befriended Dan O'Connell, the Coleman who saved many an unfortunate bohemian from a pauper's grave, and who has more than once filled the role of solitary mourner, paying the tribute of tears to deserted clay.

His "Dead Calypso"

I have a letter from Robertson written in July, 1908, certain excerpts from which I do not scruple at reproducing. "You will be sorry to hear," he wrote, "that I am approaching a helpless condition that may make it impossible for me to dress myself or do any more writing on this machine. It is eighteen years since the first symptoms of locomotor ataxia appeared, and I have always known what was waiting for me. I have, by working as much as possible on the typewriter, kept my fingers and hands in practice, but here all the conditions are unfavorable. If I were in some private room, as I have always been, I could without a doubt retard the ataxic derangement for some months at least. But that is impossible. I have no money and no prospect of getting any. Four or five of the men who have died from this disease—Sands Forman, Harry Veuve and others had money and those near them who made their way into the unknown free from the disadvantages I have to face. I have few friends left, but, thank God, one noble one, that is James V. Coleman. * * * All of my literary work will be in the hands of Jim Coleman. Another good friend of mine is George Sterling. * * * Now I want you to do me a threefold favor. It is this: to publish the enclosed version of 'The Dead Calypso.' If ever a man was sorry for what he had written I am for the first version of this poem which was published in book form seven years ago; many of the lines were imperfect, and there was too much lust in it, and yet the Times-Democrat pronounced it the best poem written in this country since Poe's Raven * * *" For a year immediately preceding his death Robertson was well cared for in a private room at the Buena Vista Sanitarium, and his expenses were paid by James V. Coleman, who is now his literary executor.

His Workmanship

Aside from the great difficulty of naming the men among one's contemporaries who will gain a foothold in the temple of literary fame, it is beyond the capacity of the average critic to judge whether Robertson's poetry possesses qualities that will contribute to its permanence. But undoubtedly it has some of the qualities that belong to what is permanent in our nature and life. It certainly breathes the essentials of man's experience. While there was in the poet an excess of sensuous feeling and very little of ethical aim, his poetry reveals him as a master of the melodies of verse. This predominated in his nature, but he treated topics of the spiritual order with thoughtfulness, grace and wisdom. There is much in Robertson that reminds us of Swinburne's "lilies and languors of virtue," his "raptures and roses of vice." Like Swinburne, also, he showed a tendency to indulge too freely in those conceits of language by which feebler poets have sought to compensate for their lack of the higher poetic qualities; but technically his workmanship is almost flawless, and there are many touches of grace and beauty scattered through his books. In some of his exquisite sonnets which are marked by simplicity and restraint he has shown a deep feeling for the poetic art. It was by his sonnets that he first attracted the attention of critics, but it was his "Dead Calypso" that gave him what measure of fame he enjoyed.

"I suppose you heard what Meanley did in church last Sunday when the plate came around to him?"

"Dropped a button in it, I suppose."

"Worse than that. He leaned over and whispered: 'I paid the pastor's carefare yesterday. We'll call it square.'"

The Mullally and Abbott Cases

What the Supreme Court will do in the cases of Thornwell Mullally and William M. Abott, in whose behalf application for a writ of habeas corpus was made this week, is of course something that even the learned jurists who sit up aloft are as yet unable to say. But during Mr. Garret McEnerney's brilliant and impressive argument in support of the application more than one member of the court gave voice to his sentiments. At the opening of the argument Justice Angellotti manifested some impatience, indicating by his manner and words that in his opinion when a man is deprived of the right of trial his only redress is by way of mandamus proceedings. This at first seemed to be a strongly intrenched preconceived notion, but its ventilation gave Mr. McEnerney the opportunity to argue the question after the Socratic method, the result being that the distinguished jurist showed signs of abandoning his position. Chief Justice Beatty and Justice Henshaw expressed themselves along lines that indicated their sympathy with the views of counsel, and Justice Shaw, though he was not inclined to take a definite position, seemed more disposed to acquiesce in, than challenge, Mr. McEnerney's exposition of the law.

A Layman Dissents

Reverting to Judge Angellotti's theory of the law, it strike me as being somewhat unsound since upon analysis it seems to imply that there is more of a burden on accused persons than the principles of justice demand. The law requires the government to prosecute and prove its charges. The defendant is not required to do anything—not even to prove his innocence. There is not the slightest obligation imposed on a defendant. Yet according to Judge Angellotti it may become necessary for a defendant to set the machinery of justice in motion in order to compel the State to perform its duties. This theory is certainly not consonant with the fundamental guarantees of personal liberty. The law is very jealous of the rights of the individual. How extremely jealous it is the rule with regard to excessive bail serves to illustrate. For exacting excessive bail a judge may be impeached. Yet Judge Angellotti would have us believe that a judge may keep an indictment hanging over a man's head for three years without the remotest intention of ever giving him a trial, and that there is nothing for the man to do but apply for a writ of mandamus in order to get—not his liberty but a trial at the hands of a judge who is obviously disposed to deny him justice. Judge Angellotti has probably lost sight of the origin of the Habeas Corpus Act. This famous act of parliament was passed under Charles II, and was intended to insure a person arrested, whether by warrant or on the spot, that at his demand he be brought by the person detaining him, before a judge who may liberate him, bail him or remand him. According to that eminent authority Francis Lieber the habeas corpus act insures a speedy trial, a trial by the law of the land and by the lawful court—three points of the last importance." And in a footnote Lieber gives this information which has a direct bearing on the Mullally and Abbott cases: "Long imprisonments before trial are customary means resorted to on the continent of Europe in order to harass the subjects. Guerrazzi and other liberals were sentenced in Tuscany on the first of July, 1853, after having been imprisoned for fifty months before ever being brought to trial. It is useless to mention more instances; for long imprisonment before trial is the rule in absolute governments whenever it suits them."

Hittell's Book to be Republished

In 1860 Theodore Hittell, the well known historian who is now white with more than the psalmist's allotment of years, published the Adventures of James Capen Adams. Capen Adams was a famous hunter and trapper whose career was crowded with wonderful deeds and escapes. Old-timers will remember him at Woodward's Gardens with his tame grizzlies. He trapped a great many animals for several circuses and was with Barnum in the heyday of the great showman's career. His life as narrated by Hittell reads like a book of fiction and immediately after its publication became a favorite boys' book. It was beautifully written and has been highly praised by the most authoritative writers on animals. For many years now this book has been out of print but by no means out of demand. On account of this fact the Scribners recently informed Hittell that they were prepared to issue a reprint of the work and would pay the author a handsome royalty. So the boys of the present generation have a treat in store for them.

Carpenter's Chinese Stories

There is no white man in San Francisco who knows Chinatown and its oriental denizens like Grant Carpenter. As a newspaperman and as an attorney he has acquired an intimate understanding of the Chinese mind and character by no means inferior to Hearn's understanding of the Japanese or Burton's understanding of the Arab. So the news that he has disposed of a series of eight Chinese stories possesses considerable literary interest. These stories will appear in the Sunset Magazine in the beginning of next year at the same time that a serial by the Williamsons commences. I am glad to say that Carpenter has received the standard eastern rate for his fiction.

Political Finesse

"Wallie" Miller, the well known architect and member of the Union League Club, bears a striking resemblance to Hiram Johnson, the Lincoln-Roosevelt aspirant for the gubernatorial nomination. Despite this likeness, however, Miller is not for Johnson but is very enthusiastic in the cause of Charlie Curry. A few days ago on a Telegraph avenue car in Oakland "Wallie" was approached by a whiskered individual who mistook him for the standard-bearer of the reformers. "Mr. Johnson," said the hirsuted one, extending a tanned paw, "I am for you and I hope you win. I am just going down to the registrar's office to register so I can sign your petition." "Wallie" Miller smiled genially; he is getting used to the mistake in identity. "My dear sir," he replied, "I am very much flattered by your good wishes. However I already have all the signatures to my petition that I need in Alameda County, so I would advise you to sign for the next best man in the race, Mr. Charlie Curry." "Why certainly, Mr. Johnson, I'll be glad to do that," said the unsuspecting Oaklander, filled with admiration of the candidate's magnanimity. And Miller says that he doesn't care how often he is mistaken for Johnson if it enables him to do Curry more good turns.

An Explanation of Hard Times

I have heard all sorts of reason advanced to account for the very real business slump which the croakers are croaking about. Some attribute it to the high cost of living superinduced by the new tariff law, others to the exorbitant rents which landlords are exacting in the downtown business district and still others to the mad passion for luxury which people in all walks of life seem to be indulging at the expense of necessary things. The latest reason I have been given is that San Francisco is having hard times on account of the unusual prosperity of the farmers. This may sound paradoxical but there is sound sense behind it. All over California the crops this year are superabundant and the farmers have been engaged longer than usual in gathering them in. In consequence they have been too busy to leave the country for the city and the merchants have had to do without the generous patronage which they distribute when they come to town to spend their year's earnings. In other words the crops have been harvested, but they have not yet been marketed and the money which usually flows into San Francisco before the summer season is thus far advanced has not been forthcoming. This explanation was given to me by a man who is extensively interested in local banks and who should know whereof he speaks.

A Change at the Fairmont

I am informed that commencing September 1 the Fairmont Hotel will be conducted on the American plan. This news is rather surprising as the tendency of all big hotels has been for a long time in the opposite direction. However, as the Fairmont is under the same management as the Palace, it is probably thought that there will be more profit in running one hotel on the European and the other on the American system. The only other hotels in this city run on the American plan are the Stewart and the Grenada. The Bellevue which will be opened about August 15 will also be conducted that way. So San Francisco will have just four American plan hotels of the first class. Throughout the State there are hotels conducted after the same fashion, notably Coronado and Byron. Who knows but that the action of the Fairmont signalizes the backward swing of the pendulum in hotel keeping to a system once extremely popular?

Carmel's First Great Man

Although Carmel-by-the-Sea is being celebrated far and wide as the destined literary center of America, its first native product is a soldier, not a poet. Donald H. Connolly of Carmel is neither a litterateur nor the son of a litterateur. He is a soldier and the son of a soldier. The father was Captain Thomas Connolly of the Twenty-fourth Infantry and the son, a native of peaceful Carmel, was recently graduated from West Point where he stood number eight in a class of eighty-two. In thus producing a man of war before a man of letters Carmel is proceeding in the natural order. Sparta had her great soldiers before she gave birth to Tyrtaeus who inspired her army with victorious courage by chanting his martial odes. Who knows but that in the days to come when Connolly, the Carmelite soldier, is leading his army to victory a Carmelite poet will have risen to cele-

A Defense of Profanity

Tom O'Connor, one of the wittiest of our young lawyers, recently bought a summer home in Larkspur and had no sooner occupied it with his family than he was drawn into the maelstrom of Larkspur litigation. The case was one of tremendous import. A grass fire broke out one afternoon and a member of the volunteer fire department, one Larsen, rushed to headquarters for a chemical extinguisher. The extinguisher was heavy so Larsen commandeered the delivery cart of an ice cream parlor to convey it to the scene of the conflagration. Now the two estimable young ladies who conduct the ice cream parlor do not like Larsen so they rushed out to protest against the appropriation of their property. But Larsen was determined to put out that grass fire at all hazards so he whipped up the horse and hurried away after flinging a couple of round imprecations at the indignant young ladies. The young ladies retaliated by having Larsen arrested for disturbing the peace and retained a youngster recently admitted to practice to prosecute him. Nothing would do Larsen but that Tom O'Connor should defend him. It was a trial by jury and all Larkspur attended. Remembering his own salad days O'Connor was careful to assist the maiden barrister on the other side in every manner possible, but his kindness was not appreciated by the youngster, so Tom decided to confine his efforts to his client and at the same time to teach the ungracious prosecutor a lesson. I am told that the youth was roundly "trimmed" by his experienced opponent, but the great event of the trial with which Larkspur is ringing from the slough to the canyon was O'Connor's closing plea to the jury. It was a masterly and exhaustive defense of profanity. O'Connor proved that fire-fighters from the time of Gulliver to the late David Scannel were noted for the impetuosity of their speech and actions and he wound up with the following plea: "Why, gentlemen of the jury, if the youthful opposing counsel had been with Farragut at Mobile and had heard him say 'Damn the torpedoes; go ahead!' he would have had him arrested for disturbing the peace." After that there was nothing to it and Larsen was triumphantly acquitted.

Bay Cities Water

The people of Oakland, Berkeley and Alameda are signing the contracts of the Bay Cities Water Company by the thousands, and it will be only a short time now until the company will begin the construction of its plant in those cities. The plant will be built in accordance with the most modern engineering ideas and will be of sufficient scope to adequately supply the needs of the bay country for many years to come. It will be constructed to meet the wants of double the present population of the cities. The Bay Cities Water Company has seventy-five million gallons daily supply in its Mt. Hamilton water sheds, available for immediate use. Work will begin when the people have signed contracts for five million gallons daily consumption. While the initial rate asked is 32 cents per one thousand gallons, it is certain, judging from the alacrity with which the property owners are signing, that the number of million gallons contracted for will be so large by the time the plant is constructed that the first water supplied will cost somewhere in the neighborhood of twenty-six or twenty-seven cents.

Miss Coffin's Return

The stimulant of absence may become so overpowering that the mind will refuse to act contrary to the heart. In support of this thesis let me adduce the case of a charming girl who instead of summering along the Mediterranean this year has returned to her suburban home in Marin County, greatly to the disappointment of her family. Incidentally everyone is on the qui vive for her next move which is expected to take the form of a very formal announcement before many weeks. When Miss Sara Coffin made her au revoirs this spring, going East with her mother, Mrs. James Coffin and her sister Natalie, there were those who wondered what the effect of her absence would be. The family had planned to meet Mrs. Edward Griffith in New York, and Miss Sara was to accompany the latter with whom she is a great pet, on a tour of the continent. The wardrobes had been prepared accordingly, with trunks full of swagger traveling togs and dainty frilly things to wear at the various resorts in southern Europe. But Miss Coffin had left behind an ardent wooer in the person of Wharton Thurston and every mail brought her his letters from Ross. Sara wasn't particularly interested in the various places which she visited in the East and Canada with her mother and sister and didn't even manifest any undue excitement over the pretty duds which Mamma Coffin purchased in New York. Finally, when the day came for sailing, all the smiles had crept from her bonnie countenance. Timidly, but very determinedly, she told Mamma Coffin she wouldn't go abroad, that she much preferred Ross and San Rafael to all those musty, old fogey places in Europe and that Mrs. Griffith would have to go alone. The family urged and cajoled but Sara knew what she was about and wouldn't budge even across the ferry. Finally the family had to yield, and the trip to Europe was deferred. Young Thurston's joy is great and unconcealed.

A Parallel Case

Since Miss Coffin's return home the other day with Natalie and her mother everyone is wondering if her case will parallel that of Carol Moore, now Mrs. Arthur Geissler who went abroad one season with her parents. Carol who was pretty much the same sort of a bonnie merry girl as Sara Coffin is, wrote back home that she preferred the dusy roads of Blithedale to the dirt of Rome anytime and what folks could see in Europe in preference to California was more than she could understand. So ennuied did she become that the family decided to let her return with some friends. In Blithedale was Arthur Geissler and straight from Rome, as fast as modern transportation could carry her, Carol came to Blithedal. It was just a short time afterwards that the engagement was announced. Which reminds me of the entirely different case of a bride now touring Europe. This is the prankish Genevieve Walker, bride of Billy Burke. Mrs. Burke recently wrote to a girl friend here that the most enchanting thing about European travel was the number of tunnels that the railroads provided, and the more tunnels, the more popular the railroads. One such road she called "The Honeymoon Trail."

Pathos in Clothes

Over at the University of California summer school a learned woman has been expatiating on the "pathos of the blue wrapper." This learned person hails from the University of Chicago and it seems that lecturing on the blue wrapper and its pathos is the latest educational wrinkle in the Windy City. As Berkeley prides itself on being au courant with the culture of the middle west it is not surprising that the classes at the summer school should be moved to tears by the hitherto unsuspected sadness that lies hid in the folds of the blue wrapper. The "blue wrapper problem"—to use summer school cant—may be summarized in a sentence: "Pity your poor old mother." Of course a lecturer from Chicago would never put it that way; neither would any of her pupils; but that is a correct summary. The blue wrapper is used to symbolize "the irresponsive woman not yet awakened to her cosmic consciousness." In other words she is the placid woman content to stay at home, wrapped in a factory-made blue calico garment, "dead to the lure of learning, insensible to woman's new position." In university circles where woman's new position is a matter of great concern this woman's case is considered very pathetic. But I can't see it. The mothers of most of our feminine lecturers and university students wore blue wrappers in their time and demanded no pity. If they had adopted the style of wearing expensive house gowns their daughters might never have been able to afford university training and so would never have discovered how superior they are to their mothers. For the benefit of those who are not posted on current university activities let me explain that the exposition of the pathos of the blue wrapper is part of the summer course in household economics.

Dancing and Culture

Let me hasten to say that the pathos of the blue wrapper is not the only subject which is being illuminated at the summer school across the bay. The scholastic pendulum swings from one extreme to the other. In another department of the summer school the talk of the lecturers deals with "the esthetic value of the carousel, the csardas and the pastourelle." These lecturers interpret the symbolic and pantomimic dances of Europe because forsooth they have proved "adaptable for playground work, thereby illustrating the physiological, psychological and educational significance of play." In the girls' gymnasium every day young women go through the mazes of the hopping dance, the board-walk dance, the Nixie polka, the Highland schottische and other evolutions, not for frivolous reasons but as part of their baccalaureate course. A great institution is the summer school of our university where the youthful feminine mind may turn from the overpowering pathos of the blue wrapper to the symbolic significance of the csardas. If I had any reason to hope that Prexy Wheeler might some day be induced to tread the mazes of a csardas I might go to the summer school myself, but not on any other pretense. I am so old-fashioned that all this stuff seems to me the veriest rubbish and I would lay liberal odds that the lecturer who talks so glibly of the pastourelle could not give offhand an intelligent account of the pastorell.

The Paradise of Lady Smokers

From recent observations I am inclined to think that when ladies desire to enjoy the privilege of smoking in public they go to the Cliff House. I am at a loss to account for this condition unless it be due to the smiling tolerance which Mine Host Farley extends to those members of the weaker sex who long for the unconventional indulgence. At the Cliff House the dear ladies may dally with the cigarette to their hearts' content. On Monday night there was a distinguished dinner party at the Cliff House. It included General and Mrs. C. R. Edwards, Colonel Biddle, Captain and Mrs. Larz Anderson and Miss McKinstry. All the ladies of the party except Miss McKinstry produced their cigarette cases during the dinner and smoked with evident enjoyment. Which goes to show that European manners are slowly stealing into this city by way of the Cliff House.

Playwright's Wife Well Known Here

A great deal of interest was taken in the production here of "An American Widow" because the wife of the author, Kellet Chambers, is a San Francisco girl. The play was given at the Alcazar recently by Virginia Harned and William Courtenay. Mrs. Chambers was formerly Mary Williams, the daughter of the late Robert Williams. She is well known in the newspaper world. She began her career as a newspaper woman in this city after the death of her first husband, Seymour Davidson, and afterwards went to New York where she gained fame on one of the papers under the name of Kate Carew. Later she met and married Harry Chambers, the playwright. He is a brother of Haddon Chambers, author of "The Tyranny of Tears" and owing to the similarity of the names Haddon and Harry he signs his plays Kellet Chambers. Mrs. Chambers' mother was one of the pretty Gluyas girls prominent here in early days.

On the Primrose Path

After going the pace that kills for a short time a well known army officer now lies in a hospital desperately ill. I can imagine the sort of reflections which dwell with him as he reviews his recent dissipations. It would be wrong to tell the name of this army officer. He is well known and so is his wife, but to envelop the family in a scandal would not serve to point the moral any more forcibly and I am in the mood for moralizing. The friends of this army officer realized some time ago that he was neglecting his wife and children for the society of an affinity. Perhaps they expostulated with him but if so, their expostulations did no good. His dissipations became wilder and wilder. One night he took his companion to the St. Francis Hotel and registered. He is so well known that the house detectives were quickly aware of his presence and he was peremptorily told to leave. There was a scene but in the end he saw the futility of argument and took his affinity elsewhere. In the endeavor to depart quietly he broke through the glass of the door near the tapestry room rather than pass the desk in the lobby. The next day the army officer returned to the hotel to denounce the management and to threaten legal proceedings, but he was coldly received. He persisted in his quarrelsome mood, however, and one of his bits of foolishness was to attempt to bribe two policemen with twenty dollar gold pieces in the presence of a couple of newspapermen. It might be thought that sober reflection would make the army officer so ashamed of his conduct that he would cease his erratic conduct and return to his family. But this did not happen. Instead he attempted at the Palace what he had failed to accomplish at the St. Francis. Again he was ordered out. And then he was taken ill. Perhaps it is a merciful illness which will save him from deeper degradation. All his friends hope that he will recover to repent his folly, for the was once a good man and it is a shame that he should go wrong.

A Comparison in Tableaux

San Franciscans in the great audience which witnessed the Tableaux Vivants in Paris, June 2, were unanimous in stating that Mrs. Walter S. Martin and her little daughter Mary who posed as "Mme. Vigee Le Brun et sa Fille" in the San Francisco Tableaux at the Hotel St. Francis, April 5, eclipsed Mrs. William Miller Graham and her daughter who represented the same picture in Paris. The Paris success which was given at La Salle Gaveau in aid of Holy Trinity Lodge and Hospital, was a brilliant social event; and was attended by many members of the American Colony in Paris, including many of the San Franciscans who took part in the tableaux given here when Mrs. W. K. Vanderbilt Jr., Miss Eleanora Sears of Boston and all the talented members of the local smart set took part.

An Ambitious Project

The success of the Tableaux Vivants, the concerts of the St. Francis Musical Art Society (which correspond to the Bagleys of the Waldorf-Astoria in New York), the plays of the fashionable San Francisco Stage Society and other entertainments of the past season, has induced the Hotel St. Francis to order a large number of new sets of scenery to add to its already lavish equipment for the theater in the Colonial Room. Among these, it is hoped, will be an artistic setting for Maeterlinck's beautiful symbolical play, Sister Beatrice, which has been the most notable production of the New Theater this year. Whether this play is produced here depends upon the success of a few public-spirited citizens who are endeavoring to arrange for an "endowed season" of plays representing the highest achievements of contemporary dramatic art as interpreted by the best artists in America. It would, of course, be impossible to make such a season pay; and an effort will therefore be made to secure, by subscription among the wealthy families of the city, an amount sufficient to defray the expense.

An Endowed Theater

The attendance will be by invitation, but an especial effort will be made to ensure the attendance and cooperation of every prominent artist and musician in the cities around San Francisco Bay; for the ultimate aim of the gentlemen who are advancing this idea is to demonstrate that there is here a sufficient appreciation of plays with an intellectual appeal to justify the erection of an endowed playhouse in San Francisco. This theater would be erected in the heart of the city, probably facing Union Square, and would for a large part of the year be devoted to presenting those dramatic works which are avoided by the average manager because of a fear that they are above the level of the average intelligence, and for the remainder of the year to a season of grand opera. The prices throughout the year will be very low, such as prevailed in the old Tivoli when Salassa and Tetrazzini originally sang there; for the promoters realize that the low-priced grand opera, patronized for months running, was one of the big assets of San Francisco before the fire, and gave her an enviable reputation among the art centers of the world—a reputation such as no other American city possessed. It is believed that a successful season in the St. Francis theater would ensure a large public subscription and also municipal assistance for a project not only to restore to citizens of modest means the opportunities for esthetic development they formerly possessed but to create in San Francisco an attraction that would be one of the strongest forces in bringing here those travelers who now go abroad to find the greater charms of living.

A Silver Wedding Celebration

Mr. and Mrs. Jack Bernhard Schroeder are giving an "at home" today at San Carlos. The affair is to celebrate the silver wedding of this well known couple and brings to mind their elopement which startled society twenty-five years ago. Mrs. Schroeder was then the young widow of Horace Hawes Jr. Hawes had only been dead seven months when his widow in a most romantic manner went out on a tug and was married by Rev. Mr. Fackenthal to the handsome young Schroeder who was a few years her junior. She had two small children, Eugenie (now Mrs. Crabtree, wife of Rev. D. M. Crabtree), and Horace, a few months old, who died when seven years old. Mr. and Mrs. Schroeder never had any children. Mrs. Schroeder was pretty Eugenie McLean when she married young Horace Hawes whose father was a well known lawyer and a most eccentric old man. Of the long litigation of Mrs. Horace Hawes Sr. over old Horace Hawes' will society need hardly be reminded. He willed his immense fortune to the church and charity but his widow eventually won. She gave with a lavish hand to all her relatives and conferred the bulk of her fortune on her two children, Horace Jr. and Caroline, now Mrs. Jimmy Robinson. Eventually she found herself poor and entirely dependent upon her children in the declining years of her life. The contest of the Hawes' will occupied the courts for many years and the testimony was more sensational than that of any case fought in our courts in recent years. Oldtimers have been recalling these things apropos the celebration of the Schroeder silver anniversary.

Tantalus Told It First

A few months ago when Miss Florence Hopkins left for a tour abroad I predicted that an engagement would be announced between Duval Moore and this charming young girl, calling attention to the undisguised manifestations of their mutual affection. On the day preceding her departure Miss Hopkins and Mr. Moore went up and down Broadway and Buchanan streets making calls. Their devotion was observed of all observers while they themselves were totally oblivious of the outside world. Now we are told that the engagement will soon be announced. As usual Town Talk was ahead of the bavardes. Miss Florence Hopkins is the youngest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Edward Hopkins. Her sisters are all prominent in the smart set. Mrs. Augustus Taylor (Helen Hopkins), Mrs. William H. Taylor Jr. (Edna Hopkins), and Mrs. Frederick W. McNear (Georgie Hopkins). Of an only brother Samuel Hopkins 'tis said that his engagement to the intimate friend of Miss Florence Hopkins has long existed, although not formally announced.

The Fairmont Season

The coming social season promises to be particularly gay this winter at the Fairmont, and more reservations have been made by prominent society folk who will spend the winter at the fashionable hostelry than were made last year. The formal season will open November 4 when Edward M. Greenway will entertain the elite with one of his famous assemblies in the Louis Quinze ball room. As Greenway does not expect to return from Europe until some time late in October, the first of the assemblies will be a brilliant function and will be attended by all the debutantes, past and to come, the dowagers who have been abroad for months, and the young men of society—all eager to greet the returned traveler. In December there will be two assemblies danced at the Fairmont on Friday, December 2 and December 28. Mr. Greenway will make the latter a Christmas party and the favors and decorations will be suggestive of good old St. Nick. The last Friday of February will also be an assembly night, but the dates have not been made further ahead than that.

Golf Tournament at Hotel Potter

A four days' tournament will be held at The Potter Country Club, Santa Barbara, commencing August 13. The links are situated on the beautiful Hope Ranch and are declared by experts the sportiest in California. It is anticipated that there will be keen competition for the valuable trophies offered and great interest is being shown by most of the well-known players of the State. Entries are coming in fast and the tournament promises to be the most exciting event of the season in golf circles. During the days of the tournament there will be a yacht regatta in the channel. This will be the great social event o fthe year in Santa Barbara and at the Potter Hotel, the management of which is guaranteeing the expense of the regatta. Cups to be raced for this year include one new first and four new seconds, to pass into the permanent possession of the winners. Other cup races will be for the Chamber of Commerce and Santa Barbara Club perpetual trophies.

The Hotel Capitola

The season at the Hotel Capitola started on June 15 and ever since that time a large number of guests have been housed in that delightful resort. The popularity of this resort is due largely to the fact that it is being conducted again by H. J. Hartwick who during the past winter was chief clerk at the Manx. Mr. Hartwick is a hotelman of great experience, his California engagements having included the chief clerkship of the Potter at Santa Barbara and the Maryland at Pasadena. Associated with Mr. Hartwick at the Capitola is C. B. Hopson in the capacity of steward, a position which, as is well known to hotel patrons, he is particularly qualified for. No expense has been spared this year to make the Capitola attractive and the result is seen in the number of people who have made reservations there.

In the Social Spotlight

The citizens of Santa Cruz have arranged a great program for the Fourth of July. Besides the usual parades there will be an automobile parade, a prize of $140 to be awarded for the best decorated car. The display of fireworks ordered will amount to upwards of $1,000. The large dirigible airship will fly over the city. There will also be a balloon ascension and parachute jump, games on the beach, swimming races, chasing ducks in the water and aerial bicycle riding. There will be a direct wire run into the Casino, and returns of the Jeffries-Johnson contest will be put on bulletins, so that all visitors may be posted upon this event. Crowds are going to Santa Cruz daily and it looks as though the resort is to have a gala season.

Mrs. Wallace Alexander was hostess at one of the pretty affairs of Thursday at the Palace, which she gave in honor of her daughter, Mrs. John Waterhouse Jr. of Honolulu. A Few Words on the Orpheum Bill

There are times when one leaves the Orpheum an insurgent, eager to swear allegiance to the slow-moving house of William Morris. There are other times when one feels that age cannot wither nor custom stale the infinite variety of the good old vaudeville theater. The mood of enthusiasm for the old is induced much more frequently than the mood of longing for the new. Although the Orpheum programs are not invariably good, there are many more good ones than bad. If it were otherwise the Orpheum would never have become the institution it is in San Francisco. I doubt whether a vaudeville theater occupies a similar position in any big city in the world. The Orpheum and the Alcazar stand high in the affections of San Francisans and without pretending to know the secrets of the box office I hazard the guess that the Orpheum is the bigger moneymaker of the two. No doubt most people think so and that must be a potent factor in the Orpheum's success; how many of us are there who do not respect the moneymaking power? During the past week the Orpheum has not been packed as it was while Vesta Victoria was there. I imagine the reason to be that many patrons who are in the habit of going every other week varied their rule in honor of the English music hall comedian and went for three successive weeks to see her. They feel surfeited with vaudeville this week and are staying away. However that may be, the Orpheum has had a very good bill during the past week. From the aeroplane girl to the human statuary it was all genuine vaudeville. The aeroplane girl is flying on the wings of popular interest. It is because her act is new and unconventional that she makes good, for she is not a vaudevillain of particular ability. She used to be one of the Ziegfield beauties and it is quite likely that she will drift back to her class when the aeroplane becomes a commonplace. The mermaids are also floating on the wave of a fad, but theirs is a more enduring novelty. Any two girls who can look as lovely under water as these two should be drawing cards for many moons to come. They are almost unique in possessing complexions that won't come off in the water and their figures are splendid. They would make the fortune of a summer resort if they would overcome their love for the water and linger on the beach. There is nothing novel about the trained dogs or the man who does sleight of hand with billiard balls. Here are acts as old as variety—much older, as a matter of fact; but they will never lose their popularity with the masses. A couple of blackface comedians can always count on a favorable hearing too; even if their act, as in the case of the two at the Orpheum during the past week, is an imitation of the Georgia Minstrels. A good playlet is never amiss but the playlet of the current bill is not a good one. I remember this line in it: "Jumping Jehosaphat, ain't this awful?" Decidedly it is. As for the human statuary—gilt statuary this time—it is very good, though we have seen better at the Orpheum. It is wonderful what delight an untutored audience takes in the classic groups of old Greece. Two of the groups represented—the death of a hero and the race—were thoroughly Greek in pose and feeling and the spectators could not get too much of them. Which goes to show that classic art is for all, not for the connoisseurs who think that they alone can adequately enjoy it. I have reserved the last word for Peter Donald and his sweet-faced wife. Peter Donald is not a Harry Lauder but he is a fine Scotch comedian just the same and his act filled me with joy. It was a great surprise when he made a little curtain speech, turning it prettily with sentiment and then twisting a bit of droll humor out of it. Here's to you, Peter, you're the best of the bill.

Mrs. Fiske in Thackeray and Ibsen

Mrs. Fiske and her Manhattan company will appear in "Becky Sharp" and "Pillars of Society" at the Columbia during the two weeks commencing Monday evening next. In her visualization of "the immortal Becky" Mrs. Fiske reaches quite a height of artistic achievement and her name will ever be associated with the part. In "Pillars of Society" Mrs. Fiske adds Lona Hessell to her gallery of Ibsen portraits and while the role is not by any means as important as Nora, Hedda or Rebecca, in it she is said to present some of the finest acting of her career. "Pillars of Society" will be given only for the Wednesday matinee performances while "Becky Sharp" will be the medium for all other performances including the regular matinees on Saturdays. The principal member of Mrs. Fiske's company is Holbrook Blinn who needs no introduction to San Francisco audiences since he is almost as well-known as Mrs. Fiske herself. In "Becky Sharp" Mr. Blinn plays that strongly marked character role, the Marquis of Steyne, and in "Pillars of Society," Consul Bernick, the character around whom the play revolves.

Miss Harned in Pinero

Of all the Pinero plays there is not one that has created more discussion than "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray" in which Virginia Harned will make her farewell appearances at the Alcazar, commencing with a Fourth of July matinee. It has been approved as a great moral lesson and censured as an unnecessary depiction of marital misfortune, but all comment pronounces it a model of playwriting skill and a wonderful analysis of the eternal feminine's promptings. Miss Harned's impersonation of Mrs. Tanqueray is said to be impressively artistic. William Courtenay will be seen as Aubrey Tanqueray, Bessie Barriscale (whose last week as an Alcazar player it will be) as Ellean Tanqueray, Louis Bennison as Captain Ardale, Howard Hickman as Sir George Orreyed, Burt Wesner as Cayley Drummle, Adele Belgarde as Mrs. Cortelyon, Louise Brownell as Lady Orreyed and Will R. Walling as Gordon Jayne, with the rest of the Alcazar players in appropriate roles.

Lily Lena Next

Miss Lily Lena, the dainty English singing comedienne who made herself an immense favorite here some time ago, has just returned from London to fill another engagement on the Orpheum Circuit and will make her reappearance next Sunday matinee. She will be heard in an entirely new repertoire of songs and the effect of her performance will be enhanced by many beautiful and novel costumes. Loie Fuller's "Ballet of Light" will be one of the big attractions next week and it is not too much to predict that its success in Boston and New York will be duplicated here. Will M. Cressy and Blanche Dayne have been secured as a special feature of next week's program and will appear in Cressy's sketch of New Hampshire life, "Grasping an Opportunity." Captain Maximilian Gruber and Miss Adelina's equestrian review is one of the best animal acts ever brought to America. It includes an elephant, a horse and a pony.

"A Black Sheep" at Ye Liberty

For the week commencing with a special holiday matinee on Monday afternoon next the Bishop players at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, will offer a revival of that famous old laughmaker, "A Black Sheep," one of the best of the Hoyt satirical comedies. It has not been seen around the bay for a good many years and will be practically new to the younger generation of playgoers, and its established reputation as a provoker of mirth should make its production at Ye Liberty next week a most profitable one. Although "A Black Sheep" is complete without them, its performance next week will be enlivened by a number of attractive specialties and musical numbers being arranged especially by Miss Maribel Seymour, in which the various members of the company will be assisted by a large chorus.

The Hackett Engagement

James K. Hackett's season at the Alcazar, commencing July 11, promises to continue the success of the "two-dollar star" experiment which Belasco & Mayer inaugurated with the engagement of Virginia Harned. There is no actor in America better or more favorably known than the man whose name is linked with "The Prisoner of Zenda" and the advance announcements of his coming have already prompted numerous inquiries as to how long he will stay and what he will present Therefore it is not premature to state that he is booked for six weeks, opening with "The Prisoner of Zenda," and that he will appear also in "Monsieur Beaucaire," "Don Caesar's Return," "Samson," "John Glade's Honor," and "The Pride of Jennico." He will bring with him Miss Beatrice Beckley, an English actress who was his leading woman last season and Arthur Hoops, one of the best "heavy men" in the country. Alcazar players will fill the remainder of the casts. It is as an exponent of stage chivalry that Mr. Hackett is best known, although he has demonstrated his ability to play almost any kind of character that demands dramatic instinct and legitimate training and method. His vehicle last season was Henri Bernstein's "Samson" which he adopted after another eminent actor had failed to impress New York with his impersonation of the title part, and his success was instanteous and enduring. It has been his invariable custom to present a new play each year, so despite the hit made by him as Samson he will portray another character next season on Broadway. Mr. Hackett is not only a great actor but also a successful producing manager. He has proved this repeatedly, so some staging of high order may be looked for during his stay at the Alcazar.

Famous Stars at Idora

With the Bevani Opera Company which opens a summer season at the Idora Park Theater on July 17, come a number of Metropolitan and Manhattan opera stars who have elected to spend the summer on the coast. Umberto Sacchetti, the famous tenor of the Metropolitan who last season shared the principal roles with Caruso and Bonci; and Eugenio Battain of Hammerstein's Manhattan Company, will essay the tenor roles. The baritones will be Achille Alberti, many seasons at La Scala in Milan; and Ettore Campana of the Metropolitan Company and the favorite baritone of Mascagni. Alexander Bevani, late of the Carl Rosa and Royal Opera at Covent Garden, London; and Joseph Florian of Savage's English Opera Company will carry the bass roles. The sopranos will be Guiditta Francini, the wonderful coloratura who can trill on high E flat; Regina Vicarino of the Manhattan Company and Estella Burgess, late of savage's English Opera Co.

TRIANGLE TRIP OVER THE NORTHWESTERN PACIFIC RAILROAD

One of the most delightful scenic one-day jaunts in America.

150 miles of mountain and redwood forest scenery, a boat ride on San Francisco Bay and along the Russian River.

Leave San Francisco at 8:45 a. m. daily (and 6:45 a. m. Sunday only) by boat across the Bay of San Francisco, in full view of the Golden Gate to Sausalito, (the Sorrento of America). Thence via picturesque San Rafael and thriving Petaluma (home of the chicken industry), through Sonoma Valley to Santa Rosa and Fulton. From Fulton through magnificent mountain scenery and redwood forests, and along Russian River to Monte Rio. Return is made along the coast, passing Tomales Bay, Point Reyes, San Anselmo, etc., to Sausalito, arriving at San Francisco at 7:35 the same evening.

If preferred, trip can be reversed, leaving San Francisco at 8:15 a. m. via the coast to Monte Rio and returning along the river and through the valleys, arriving at San Francisco 7:05 same evening. On Sundays an extra train arrives at 9:05 p. m.

Round Trip Fare for Triangle Trip, $2.80, except on Fridays or Saturdays, it is $2.50, and on Sundays only $2.20.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—It was unnecessary for the uncertain crop outlook in the northwest to create a selling movement in stocks as Wickersham did the work in good shape by his speech on government supervision of all issues of securities by corporate interests. The question of merit in this proposition was not the factor so much as the incessant agitation for government supervision of everything in sight that creates unsettlement in Wall street and the business interests of the country at large. There is little doubt that important interests were ready to see a somewhat better market before this episode. But it looks as if hope in this direction might now be given up. Last week's selling was good and the probability is that the market will be allowed to drift in its downward course again. It looks as if stocks should be liquidated on any strong spots.

Wheat—This market the past week has been governed by the weather in the three northwest states. Until now the weather has been detrimental to the crop as a whole and distinctly injurious to early sown wheat on light soil, and it is from this particular territory that sensational claims of damage have been received. The territory referred to covers about five per cent of the entire wheat area. The balance is heavy soil, early and late sown, and is not subject at all to these sensational reports. In our opinion rains which have occurred in the last twenty-four hours have practically eliminated damage talk. With Canadian wheat almost in line for import, and foreign markets so far out of line that they look hopeless, the question arises, "What are we to do with the surplus from 1909?" Wheat values are high from any conservative viewpoint and must be adjusted to an international basis between now and the time that spring wheat is harvested.

Corn—In our opinion it is not so much a question of reseeding, weedy condition or poor seed, so much as what will be done with the immense surplus of old corn of questionable keeping quality carried over from last year's crop. This factor coupled with a sufficient increase in area to take care of moderate losses from reseeding and other reasons, make us skeptical about maintaining any sixty cent level for corn until a larger proportion of the old crop has been disposed of than is the case now.

Cotton—The situation in the cotton market has not changed materially for some time. Both sides seem to be lying low, each faction depending more or less on the weather reports to help their contention as to the price of the new crop options. The bulls declare that they have the situation in hand for a good squeeze in July and August deliveries, and seemingly the amount of cotton on hand makes this statement reasonable and even plausible. On the other hand the curtailment by the cotton mills of the United States must be looked into, studied, and given due consideration. This curtailment has been operative to a greater or less extent since last October, and now it has been shown that it has materially extended this last week in New England. The Fall River Iron Works Co's cotton mills at Fall River controlled by M. C. D. Borden, equipped with 467,000 spindles, is closed this week and will be idle on alternate weeks until further notice. B. B. & R. Knight and Co., operating over 500,000 spindles in Rhode Island and Massachusetts, have placed their establishment on a four day per week running basis, and a number of mills at various points in New England have given notice of a two weeks' stoppage in July. Meanwhile curtailment is in progress at Fall River and a strike is on at Lowell. Explanation of the resort of these numerous other mills to curtailment is doubtless to be found in the high cost of cotton as compared with the level of values, upon which demand for goods is based. In conclusion we mention the fact that the first bale of cotton of the new crop was picked and sent to the market last Wednesday. This very early marketing in the face of the statements of a backward crop would lead us to believe that the weather conditions, up to date at least, have been more propitious than was generally supposed.

Copper—It is production rather than consumption which unsettles the market, especially as, taking a long distance view of the situation, the outlook is for more copper in 1910 than in 1909 and more in 1911 than in 1910. The total production for five months in 1910 was 500 million pounds compared with 564 million in 1909. Great hopes having been entertained that good business during the second half of the year would enable demand to keep pace with the supply, discouragement is proportionately keen at the prospect that these expectations may be disappointed. If the market has been leaning on a broken reed in this respect there would seem to be nothing now, in the absence of a copper combination, except for the inexorable law of supply and demand to take its course until an equilibrium between supply and demand is established. There is a serious revival of talk of a copper merger. The combination is evidently to come. The real question involved is what coterie of financial interests is to dominate it? The Lake coppers with their Boston connections have always held aloof from the western mining interest. Among the latter there are three groups of leaders all sparring for an opening—The Phelps-Dodge, Cole-Ryan and the Guggenheims. Any three-cornered battle between these interests would be so expensive that it may be safely said that the banking interests involved would interfere. Amalgamated's position is becoming more and more questionable. Its market level seems so far out of proportion to its income that it is reasonable to look for its shares to come down in price. The heaviest financial powers are identified with copper and they have learned the advantage of unification over competition. The copper merger is more nearly now at hand than it has ever been at any time heretofore. When this has become a fact we may unquestionably look for a large restriction in production and then surely for an advance in the metal, and with the cost of production becoming less through the economies of good management the stocks of the more responsible and higher grade companies should be at much higher levels.

his most scrutinizing enemy could fix no single act of immorality upon him! Temperate, decorous, self-restrained, he had passed through all the excitements of California unstained. No man could charge him with broken faith or violated trust; of habits simple and inexpensive, he had no lust of gain. He overreached no man's weakness in a bargain, and withheld from no man his just dues. Never, in the history of the State, has there been a citizen who has borne public relations more stainless in all respects than he.

But it is not by this standard he is to be judged. He was a public man, and his memory demands a public judgment. What was his public crime? The answer is in his own words: "I die because I was opposed to a corrupt administration, and the extension of slavery." Fellow-citizens, they are remarkable words, uttered at a very remarkable moment; they involve the history of his sensatorial career, and of its sad and bloody termination.

When Mr. Broderick entered the Senate, he had been elected at the beginning of a Presidential term as the friend of the President-elect, having undoubtedly been one of his most influential supporters. There were unquestionably some things in the exercise of the appointing power which he could have wished otherwise; but he had every reason to remain with the Administration which could be supposed to weigh with a man in his position. He had heartily maintained the doctrine of popular sovereignty, as set forth in the Cincinnati platform, and he never wavered in his support till the day of his death. But when in his judgment the President betrayed his obligations to his party and country—when, in the whole series of acts in relation to Kansas, he proved recreant to his pledges and instructions—when the whole power of the Administration was brought to bear upon the legislative branch of the Government, in order to force slavery upon an unwilling people—then, in the high performance of his duty as a Senator, he rebuked the Administration by his voice and vote, and stood by his principles. It is true, he adopted no half-way measures. He threw the whole weight of his character into the ranks of the opposition. He endeavored to arouse the people to an indignant sense of the iniquitous tyranny of Federal power, and kindling with the contest, became its fiercest and firmest opponent. Fellow-citizens, whatever may have been your political predilections, it is impossible to repress your admiration, as you review the conduct of the man who lies hushed in death before you. You read in his history a glorious imitation of the great popular leaders who have opposed the despotic influences of power in other lands and in our own. When John Hampden died on Chalgrove field, he sealed his devotion to popular liberty with his blood. The eloquence of Fox found the sources of its inspiration in his love for the people. When Senators conspired against Tiberius Gracchus, and the Tribune of the people fell beneath their daggers, it was power that prompted the crime and demanded the sacrifice. Who can doubt, if your Senator had surrendered his free thought, and bent in submission to the rule of the Administration—who can doubt that, instead of resting on a bloody bier, he would have this day been reposing in the inglorious felicity of Presidential sunshine?

Fellow-citizens, let no man suppose that the death of the eminent citizen of whom I speak was caused by any other reason than that to which his own words assign it. It has been long foreshadowed—it was predicted by his friends—it was threatened by his enemies: it was the consequence of intense political hatred. His death was a political necessity, poorly veiled beneath the guise of a private quarrel. Here, in his own State, among those who witnessed the late canvass, who know the contending leaders, among those who know the antagonists on the bloody ground—here, the public conviction is so thoroughly settled, that nothing need be said. Tested by the correspondence itself, there was no cause, in morals, in honor, in taste, by any code, by the custom of any civilized land, there was no cause for blood. Let me repeat the story—it is as brief as it is fatal: A judge of the Supreme Court descends into a political convention—it is just, however, to say that the occasion was to return thanks to his friends for an unsuccessful support. In a speech bitter and personal, he stigmatized Senator Broderick and all his friends in words of contemptuous insult. When Mr. Broderick saw that speech, he retorted, saying in substance, that he had heretofore spoken of Judge Terry as an honest man, but that he now took it back. When inquired of, he admitted that he had so said, and connected his words with Judge Terry's speech as prompting them. So far as Judge Terry personally was concerned, this was the cause of mortal combat; there was no other.

In the contest which has just terminated in the State, Mr. Broderick had taken a leading part; he had been engaged in controversies very personal in their nature, because the subjects of public discussion had involved the character and conduct of many public and distinguished men. But Judge Terry was not one of these. He was no contestant; his conduct was not in issue; he had been mentioned but once incidentally—in reply to his own attack—and, except as it might be found in his peculiar traits or peculiar fitness, there was no reason to suppose that he would seek any man's blood. When William of Nassau, the deliverer of Holland, died in the presence of his wife and children, the hand that struck the blow was not nerved by private vengeance. When the fourth Henry passed unharmed amid the dangers of the field of Ivry, to perish in the streets of his capital by the hand of a fanatic, he did not seek to avenge a private grief. An exaggerated sense of personal honor—a weak mind with choleric passions, intense sectional prejudice united with great confidence in the use of arms—these sometimes serve to stimulate the instruments which accomplish the deepest and deadliest purpose.

Fellow-citizens! One year ago today I performed a duty, such as I perform today, over the remains of Senator Ferguson, who died as Broderick died, tangled in the meshes of the code of honor. Today there is another and more eminent sacrifice. Today I renew my protest; today I utter yours. The code of honor is a delusion and a snare; it palters with the hope of a true courage and binds it at the feet of crafty and cruel skill. It surrounds its victim with the pomp and grace of the procession, but leaves him bleeding on the altar. It substitutes cold and deliberate preparation for courageous and manly impulse, and arms the one to disarm the other; it may prevent fraud between practiced duelists who should be forever without its pale, but it makes the mere "trick of the weapon" superior to the noblest cause and the truest courage. Its pretense of equality is a lie—it is equal in all the form, it is unjust in all the substance—the habitude of arms, the early training, the frontier life, the border war, the sectional custom, the life of leisure, all these are advantages which no negotiation can neutralize, and which no courage can overcome.

But, fellow-citizens, the protest is not only spoken in your words and in mine— it is written in indelible characters; it is written in the blood of Gilbert, in the blood of Ferguson, in the blood of Broderick; and the inscription will not altogether fade.

With the administration of the code in this particular case, I am not here to deal. Amid passionate grief, let us strive to be just. I give no currency to rumors of which personally I know nothing; there are other tribunals to which they may well be referred, and this is not one of them. But I am here to say, that whatever in the code of honor or out of it demands or allows a deadly combat where there is not in all things entire and certain equality, is a prostitution of the name, is an evasion of the substance, and is a shield blazoned with the name of Chivalry, to cover the malignity of murder.

And now, as the shadows turn toward the east, and we prepare to bear these poor remains to their silent resting place, let us not seek to repress the generous pride which prompts a recital of noble deeds and manly virtues. He rose unaided and alone; he began his career without family or fortune, in the face of difficulties; he inherited poverty and obscurity; he died a Senator in Congress, having written his name in the history of the great struggle for the rights of the people against the despotism of organization and the corruption of power. He leaves in the hearts of his friends the tenderest and the proudest recollections. He was honest, faithful, earnest, sincere, generous, and brave: he felt in all the great crises of his life that he was a leader in the ranks; that it was his high duty to uphold the interests of the masses; that he could not falter. When he returned from that fatal field, while the dark wing of the Archangel of Death was casting its shadows upon his brow, his greatest anxiety was as to the performance of his duty. He felt that all his strength and all his life belonged to the cause to which he had devoted them. "Baker," said he—and to me they were his last words—"Baker, when I was struck I tried to stand firm, but the blow blinded me, and I could not." I trust it is no shame to my manhood that tears blinded me as he said it. Of his last hour I have no heart to speak. He was the last of his race; there was no kindred hand to smooth his couch or wipe the death damp from his brow; but around that dying bed strong men, the friends of early manhood, the devoted adherents of later life, bowed in irrepressible grief, "and lifted up their voices and wept."

But, fellow-citizens, the voice of lamentation is not uttered by private friendship alone—the blow that struck his manly breast has touched the heart of a people, and as the sad tidings spread, a general gloom prevails. Who now shall speak for California?—who be the interpreter of the wants of the Pacific Coast? Who can appeal to the communities of the Atlantic who love free labor? Who can speak for masses of men with a passionate love for the classes from whence he sprung? Who can defy the blandishments of power, the insolence of office, the corruption of administrations? What hopes are buried with him in the grave!

"Ah! who that gallant spirit shall resume,
Leap from Eurotas' bank, and call us from the tomb?"

But the last word must be spoken, and the imperious mandate of Death must be fulfilled. Thus, O brave heart! we bear thee to thy rest. Thus, surrounded by tens of thousands, we leave thee to the equal grave. As in life, no other voice among us so rang its trumpet blast upon the ear of freemen, so in death its echoes will reverberate amid our mountains and valleys, until truth and valor cease to appeal to the human heart.

Good friend! true hero! hail and farewell.

as cool and white as a dairy. No smell, no smoke, no heat, no dust. No old-fashioned contrivances. The is the latest practical, scientific cook-stove. It will cook the most elaborate dinner without heating the kitchen.

New Perfection
WICK BLUE FLAME

Boils, bakes, or roasts better than any range. Ready in a second. Extinguished in a second. Fitted with Cabinet Top, with collapsible rests, towel rack, and every up-to-date feature imaginable. You want it, because it will cook any dinner and not heat the room. No heat, no smell, no smoke, no coal to bring in, no ashes to carry out. It does away with the drudgery of cooking, and makes it a pleasure. Women with the light touch for pastry especially appreciate it, because they can immediately have a quick fire, simply by turning a handle. No half-hour preparation. It not only is less trouble than coal, but it costs less. Absolutely no smell, no smoke; and it doesn't heat the kitchen.

Cautionary Note: Be sure you get this stove—see that the name-plate reads "New Perfection."

The nickel finish, with the turquoise blue of the enameled chimneys, makes the stove ornamental and attractive. Made with 1, 2 and 3 burners; the 2 and 3-burner stoves can be had with or without Cabinet.

ingly appetizing and bracing by the temperate man who has been at desk or book or counter all day, and who can safely steer from one to two or three just before his six o'clock dinner. A floating toddy used to be a neat thing in its way. I saw John Van Buren, that prince of good fellows, make one at the Pewter Mug, near Tammany Hall, in 1856. Dissolve a lump of sugar in half a glass of water, then pour the liquor—which must be good—into a spoon, and let it run into the water slowly from the spoon down upon one side of the glass; the liquor will float on top. Drink it all off, and you will not taste the liquor, but feel its effect.

Vermouth and sherry—the latter with a dash of Angostura bitters—are delightful appetizers. Another marked favorite is the crusta, invented by a Spaniard, Santina, celebrated in the spirit art. There is a dainty after-dinner drink—a little one—that is a favorite with ladies, called brandy scaffa; simply a wine-glass of brandy and maraschino, half-and-half, with two dashes of bitters.

Egg-nogg is of American origin. It was formerly indispensable in the Southern States at Christmas, where it was invented, (in Nashville), and prepared hot. It is a favorite throughout the North at all seasons; and, having emerged from American to cosmopolitan popularity, is called in Scotland "auld man's milk." The Baltimore egg-nogg, made cold, is the chief; it is digestible, never causes headache, and is an excellent drink for debilitated persons, and a nourishing diet for consumptives. This medicine-food-and-drink when perfectly made consists of the yolks of eight eggs and six tablespoonfuls of granulated sugar, beaten to a cream; the third of a nutmeg grated in, and beaten again; a gill of brandy or of Jamaica rum, and a wine-glass of Maderia poured in; then the whites of the eight eggs, reduced to froth, beaten in; to which are added three pints of milk. Then pour from one vessel to another for five or six minutes, and you will have an incomparable nectar-nogg sufficient for six or seven persons. Sherry egg-nogg for a single person is made of a tablespoonful of sugar, an egg, two wine-glasses of sherry, ice, milk, and nutmeg. The sugar is first dissolved in a little water, the yolk of the egg broken into a large glass, a quarter of a tumbler of broken ice added, milk poured in, the ingredients thoroughly mixed, and dust of nutmeg on top,—and the cup is ready to be quaffed.

The Dam at Pine Lodge in the Santa Cruz Mountains

The California egg-nogg, which is preferred by most people to the Baltimore, is made like the above, except that a gill and a half of whiskey or brandy and a gill of rum are the liquors used, with a dash of maraschino or absinthe, if handy.

My fomula for a Christmas egg-nogg is as follows: "An egg for each person—a wineglassful of brandy or whiskey for each person; a tablespoonful of rum, ditto powdered sugar to taste, and nutmeg. It is prepared in this way: First break the egg; second, separate white and yolk, beating the white to a foam; third, stir the powdered sugar into the yolk; then mix the whites with the beaten yolk and incorporate the two thoroughly. Now pour in the liquor slowly while mixing. Let it stand ten minutes so that the liquor will slightly cook the egg. Pour a pint of rich cream in for every four portions, slowly stirring, and let it stand two minutes. Ladle it out in goblets, and if you like nutmeg sprinkle it on top. Use rum or not, just as you prefer the flavor."

The gin fizz—which was wholly undreamed of thirty years ago—is an exceedingly delicious and refreshing concoction, aids digestion, and has become one of the most acceptable drinks of the day in all large cities during the summer months. There are the fizz, the royal fizz and the grand royal fizz, the latter made as follows, according to the late Tom Ochiltree: Take one teaspoonful of powdered or granulated sugar, the juice of half a lemon, a fresh egg, the quanity of an ordinary drink of Old Tom gin, and add half a pony of "Creme de Vanille" cordial. Dissolve all well with a shaker and fill up the rest of the glass with an effervescing water. Squeeze a drop or two of lemon peel upon the mixture and sprinkle lightly with nutmeg. The gin-rickey is one of the most exhilarating drinks ever known. It is principally made of gin and the juice of a half lemon or a whole lime, with plenty of cracked (not shaved) ice, and topped with some good effervescing water from a siphon—invented about twenty-five years ago by a Washington bartender another part of the house, through curtained doors into a small, boudoir-like room, where we waited about ten minutes.

"I must confess that I began to feel somewhat nervous. My aunt looked uneasy, and sighed from time to time. She arranged my dress and touched up my curls as they do when you sit for a photograph. The immense house we were in seemed to me more silent than the convent I had just left, and I could not help wishing myself back there again. The convent seemed like home compared to this strange and splendid mansion, where no sounds were heard, not even from the troops of domestics. It was this fact that impressed me so strangely.

"My aunt was walking up and down the little room we were in, her face wearing an expressions of suspense and anxiety. I said to myself: 'It is evident that I am the central figure in this visit,' and my head swam with all sorts of fancies. 'Could it be that I was to be shut up in this house, bound over as a servant of some sort? Or was it that I was to become companion to some invalid?' These thoughts must have taken the color out of my cheeks, for my aunt exclaimed, harshly: 'What is the matter? You are as pale as if you were going to be executed. You look like a fright, all your beauty gone!'

"Then the curtains parted, and a tall valet, in black and gold livery, ushered us through another richly furnished room, then through a small door hung with Oriental drapery. My aunt had just time to pinch my arm when we stood face to face with two men, one seated in a large easy-chair, the other partly reclining on a Turkish divan. They were smoking houkas. The one in the easy-chair half rose and bowed indifferently as we came in, while the other never moved, but eyed us calmly, much as one would look at a domestic entering the room with a salver of sweetmeats. The room was filled with tobacco smoke, which made me cough, and this gave my cheeks a little color. Coffee was served in Turkish cups, and while we were sipping it, the man in the easy-chair rose and began to walk nonchalantly about the room, ending by walking slowly around me in a circle, gazing at me all the time. I felt embarrassed, not knowing what all this meant; but my aunt seemed pleased, and, seeing her so self-possessed, I succeeded in mastering my nervousness. My aunt conversed with this man in German and Turkish. He now sat down again, and said to my aunt in German: 'That man on the divan is Kallif, my twin brother. He is here from Constantinople on a visit.'

"'Yes,' replied my aunt. "I knew you had a twin brother, although I had never seen him.'

"I now took a good look at this man Kallif. He was the image of his brother in the easy-chair before us, and after close scrutiny I saw that his features only differed from those of his brother in this: one eye was the color of agate. The age of the brothers might have been guessed at forty; and the expression of their faces was something between indifference and moroseness. Although I knew nothing about the Oriental character, I instinctively resented the secretive, taciturn power of these two men. The one in the easy-chair, whose name I afterwards learned was Racham, did little more than listen while my aunt talked, and I knew that when she spoke in Turkish she was alluding directly to me, for at these moments he would eye me in the strangest manner possible."

Here the Countess ceased talking, and I thought she had changed her mind and would say no more, but after a few moments she continued:

"All of a sudden I was possessed with a feeling of distrust and fear, and it was with some difficulty that I remained seated in my chair; but just at that moment a black servant brought in refreshments on a silver tray, and as we rose to change our seats my nerves became somewhat calmed. I looked again at Kallif, who had never left the divan, and never ceased smoking. His face now looked sinister. The agate eye was more searching than before, and he scrutinized me with the features of a human owl, blinking under a light that seemed too strong for his strange, weird eyes. His glance inspired me with horror, yet I stared at him as one stares at serpents in a zoological garden.

"After some words in Turkish, my aunt rose to go. We were shown out through another suite of apartments, up and down other stairs, and I now realized the immense size of the house.

"Our carriage was waiting for us in the courtyard. On the way to my aunt's home, in another part of Vienna, she said:

"'The two men you have just seen are twin brother, sons of your mother's aunt, who married a wealthy Turk of Constantinople. Racham, who talked with us, was educated in Vienna.' She was silent for a time, then resumed: 'The two brothers are very wealthy; the gold and silver treasures in this house must be worth a vast sum. Kallif, who was lying on the divan, comes to visit Racham every two years, bringing with him from Turkey the spoils of conquest and other perquisites, amounting to millions, which are hidden along with the other treasures in secret places. Kallif is gloomy and silent, but so much the better.' I trembled while my aunt was making this revelation, and I could see Kallif's eyes—half owl, half snake, as if hypnotizing his victims before destroying them.

"My aunt continued: 'This Kallif is here now with fresh treasure from the East; he brings the gold to his brother, fearing a panic or revolution in Constantinople. I have these secrets from a relative who knows the history of the twins from their youth up.'

"I listened to this with the interest that a young girl would listen to a page from the Arabian Nights; but when my aunt suddenly said, in a dry hard tone: 'I told Racham just now that you should be his wife before the end of a week,' I nearly lost consciousness. I imagined myself already in his power! But my aunt kept on talking like an oracle: 'Racham is the man, you will have nothing to do with Kallif; he will soon be off again to the East, and Racham will be left alone in the great mansion we have just visited. You will be mistress of everything, and I will see that all goes well. It is my desire that you marry this man, and marry him you must.'

"It seemed useless to protest; I felt I was overpowered. When we arrived at my aunt's home a dressmaker was sent for, and within a few days my trousseau was almost completed.

"Then came the ordeal of the wedding. My aunt procured a powerful tonic for my nerves, and at the appointed time I found myself standing in the church with the twin brothers and my aunt, to be married to Racham.

"That same day my aunt left for Paris, promising to return in a couple of weeks, and assuring me that I had nothing to fear, and that Racham, my husband, would take every care of me.

"I will not attempt a description of my feelings when she had left the mansion and I found myself alone with these two strange men and the servants. Racham, however, proved very good and kind; yet once in a while I had something like a horrible premonition of impending evil, through his brother Kallif, and every day I prayed for his speedy departure for Constantinople.

"In the afternoon of the ninth day after the wedding I was standing at the top of the grand staircase, about to descend, when a group of men appeared at the bottom. The light below was very dim, and I could hardly see. They mounted slowly to the top, carrying something. 'They are bringing in more spoils from the Turkish provinces,' I said to myself. I had stepped aside a few paces, waiting for the men to pass with their load, and as they approached I turned to look. It was the dead body of Racham! He had died from a stroke of apoplexy while out riding.

"All at once I realized that I was alone in the house with the insidious Kallif, and I ran to my boudoir and locked myself it. It seemed an age, but I had not been there long when I was startled by three hard, pointed raps. All of a tremble, I unlocked the door, and in walked Kallif.

"'Ma chere,' he said, looked at my blanched and frightened face, 'the shock of my brother's sudden death has been too much for you. I will ring for some cognac or kirsch, and you will soon be better; be thankful it was not I, your husband, who was taken so suddenly.'

"In a flash I saw his sinister meaning and my brain reeled. He made a movement as if to caress me, but I sank to the floor in a dead faint.

"It must have been late at night when I opened my eyes. I was in my own room, with a low light burning. On the sofa lay a tall, elderly woman, whose name was Minka. I had occasionally seen her about the house, in what capacity I hardly knew, but I had a vague idea that she was the housekeeper. Slowly everything of the previous day came back to me, and the mental agony I went through for the rest of the night I leave to your imagination. Rack my brain as I would, I could not see my way to escape from this house, and Kallif, if he persisted in pretending to be my husband. My aunt was hundreds of miles away in Paris; I did not even know her actual address, and I knew full well the inutility of appealing to any of the domestics.

"Several days went by. Racham was quietly buried, and I saw very little of Kallif, much to my relief, as you can guess. I had regained much of my calm, and began to think that, after all, everything might yet be well, when, the day after the burial of Racham, Kallif came to me and bade me follow him to another part of the house, saying he wished to show me something. Meeting the glance of his agate eye, I was too terrified to refuse. He led me down the grand staircase, through the hall, then stopped in front of a door on the left, which he opened with a key, and we entered a room hung in rich draperies with mystical characters in Arabic and Turkish. The place seemed wrapped in a vague element of mystery."

(To be Concluded next Week.)

From Oakland to Visalia, a distance of 268 miles, in 9 hours and 15 minutes or an average of 29 miles per hour over roads with frequent grades is a record of which the largest and most powerful automobile could well be proud. This performance, however, was achieved by a little Hupmobile driven by H. C. Ray of Visalia who had taken delivery of the car from S. G. Chapman just previous to the run.

A. H. Pollard, the widely known president of the Pollard Steamship Co., is the most recent convert to Morgan & Wright Nobby Tread Tire efficiency. L. R. Hirsch, whose Chalmers "40" is a well known car, is also using the Nobbies.

E. G. Hill of Emeryville is a staunch advocate of Hartford tires. He states to Chanslor & Lyon that, although he drives his cars over some of the hardest mountain roads in the State where rocks abound, he has always found the Hartfords equal to all occasions. Mr. Hill is well satisfied that these are the most serviceable tires made.

R. M. Saltzer of Redding who owns the largest wholesale and retail general merchandise business in Northern California, took recent delivery of a Dorris car. The popularity that this machine is achieving in Redding and vicinity is unmistakable.

A car ordered at the time of the Chicago Show and specially designed for Mrs. Drexler has just arrived in San Francisco and is now attracting much attention at the rooms of the Pioneer Automobile Co. The car which is undoubtedly one of the most beautiful which has ever come to town, has a chassis furnished by the Thomas Company and a Lozier body built by the Cunningham Body Company of Syracuse. Mrs. Drexler was assisted in making her choice of the machine by several automobile experts.

During the latter part of last week S. G. Chapman unloaded two car loads of Hupmobiles. A wonderfully large number of these small cars have been placed by Chapman already this season and the demand is on the increase.

A First Glimpse of Pine Lodge in the Santa Cruz Mountains

The following letter has been received by the Diamond Rubber people: Paso Robles, Cal. Diamond Rubber Co., 601 Mission street, San Francisco, Cal. Gentlemen: I am driving a model 45 Rambler touring car belonging to W. W. Parlin of Coalinga, Cal. The car came equipped with Diamond tires and has run nearly fifteen thousand miles (15,000). All of the tires have run over twelve thousand miles, two were retreaded and are still on the car The other two are used as extras. The car has run most of the time around the Coalinga oil fields and has been given the most severe usage, running over all kinds of bad roads in all kinds of hot and cold weather. You can rest assured we will always use and boost Diamond tires. Yours truly, Ray V. Nanscawen.

The high regard in which men who really know hold Morgan & Wright Nobby Tread Tires for service of the genuine strenuous type is receiving ample illustration of late. Hardly had the Chalmers Glidden Tour pathfinder successfully negotiated its most difficult trip on Nobbies when the Flanders "20" started out on its sensational "Three Flag" run from Quebec to the City of Mexico, equipped with similar tires. Considering their short time on the market, Nobby Tread popularity is wonderful.

George Price and George M. Lund, two enthusiastic autoists of Ferndale, Humboldt County, passed through town recently on the last leg of an extensive tour over some of the hardest grades to be found anywhere in the State. They left Eureka in a Hudson runabout and drove through the mountains and over roads unused to automobiles all the way to Lake Tahoe. In addition they made several tours in the Lake Tahoe region, taking a number of the steepest runs in record times. While in San Francisco the party made a trip around the bay, going down the Oakland side and returning via San Mateo. Mr. Price stated that they had toured several thousand miles in the car over roads that could not well have been more difficult. No repairs or overhauling have yet been necessary and Mr. Price is well satisfied with the machine.

Mr. E. P. Brinegar, president of the Pioneer Automobile Company, is advised by a friend that the Dayton Lighting Company, Dayton, Ohio, appreciating the large sale of electric current to be obtained from the use of electric cars, has recently employed a man to look after this trade exclusively. Since this man was added to the force of the Dayton Lighting Company a few months ago the number of electric cars now in use is almost double and it is a well known fact that there are now more electric cars in use in Dayton than in any other city of the same size.

J. R. Fordyce, a very prominent engineer of Little Rock, Ark., and a member of the American Society of Mechanical Engineers, recently took delivery of a White Gasoline car. His opinion of it is expressed in a letter just forwarded to H. E. Doty, coast manager of the White Company. It reads: "I have recently purchased your Model GB White Gasoline car. After carefully looking over the field, I consider that this car is the most modern in design, equipment and material of any car built in America today. So far it has given splendid satisfaction and I anticipate a great deal of pleasure at a small expense."

A telegram received by the Standard Motor Car Co. announces another Ford achievement. It reads. "Ford Model T entered and driven by owner, E. M. Willingham, Atlanta, wins perfect score, Atlanta-New York endurance run. Seventy cars entered. We beat sixty-four of them. Other five cars with clean scores, with one exception, cost three to six thousand dollars."

The Haynes is proving a very popular car with physicians who use machines in making their professional calls. Among deliveries recently made for this purpose are cars to Dr. E. Schmoll of Muir Tavern and Dr. Adams of Oakland.

R. Bancroft and Sons, Merced agents for the Howard Automobile Co., have just received shipment of two Buick "40" touring cars and a Buick "40" roadster.

Harlow Bricca and Co., the well known local mail order house, has just purchased one of the Overland delivery wagons, the first shipment of which was but recently received by J. W. Leavitt & Co. The wagon is being specially painted after a pattern used by the mail order house in their poster advertising. The wagon will be used throughout the whole State and beside its value as a delivery wagon it is also expected to do much in an advertising way.

Letters

"Faith and Health"

Rev. Charles Reynolds-Brown has added another to his popular series of helpful volumes, for there is no doubt that a large number of people do derive help from these familiar and rather personal "talks" on subjects of interest to them. In "Faith and Health" the author tries to point out the direct connection between an abiding faith and its effect on bodily health, but he is as far as possible from advocating the blind confidence recommended by so many religious healers. On the contrary, simmered down to final facts, all he claims is readily admitted by common sense, for it amounts only to an advocacy of the elimination of the expectancy of misfortune, a confidence in the power, if not in the intention of the Creator to heal or ward off bodily ills and due regard for the laws of health and hyigene, not omitting any of the recognized means towards the end. Dr. Brown, who was himself a student of Christian Science, a belief which he repudiates, is judiciously careful on the whole, in the chapter which he devotes to that subject. He does not believe that a general expansion of the Emanuel Movement would be good policy for either the ecclesiastical or the medical profession, but sees in cooperation the solution of the difficulty. Health, which has become almost a fetich in these days, is only a comparatively recent fad, and those of us who feel no need for such contributions as "Faith and Health" should bear it in mind that two generations ago and less people—women especially—literally enjoyed poor health. One might as well have told a woman she looked coarse and vulgar as have tried to compliment her on looking well. Little girls were censured as for a deliberate fault in looking "so healthy and vulgar." Their bonnets and mittens were sewed on securely in the morning, lest the sun should reach and mar the whiteness of their skins, and older maidens nibbled at magnesia or at chalk or slate pencils if that were not attainable, and took sips of vinegar in the hope of inducing and retaining an interesting pallor. One of the strictest canons of ladyhood forbade the confession of an appetite, especially before the other sex. Miss might pick daintily at a square inch of the breast of chicken and toy with her dessert, but eat she must not. The vulgar physical craving was to be satisfied by a surreptitious visit to the pantry. A family disease was an heirloom to be prized, and if one of the household showed symptoms of consumption no effort was made to withstand it. On the contrary, the incipient invalid was expected to accept the doom as a matter of course, and to be cheered by reminiscences of "Sister Lizy," or "your Aunt Marthy's boy," or "Cousin Ellen." Every household had its own standard remedy to be partaken of by old and young without reference to need or nauseousness. It would "do you good" in some mysterious way as the Orientals have been known to swallow the paper on which a prescription was written, trusting to faith for effect. To be "delicate" was the ideal striven for, and it still survives amongst the "Crackers" and "Piney-wood tackeys" of the south, whose stereotyped answer to the conventional "How are you?" is "Thes er-gruntin!" The same class who once reveled in this pseudo-invalidism and cultivated an air of languidness have now swung to the other extreme. They pursue health as strenuously as they do their other pleasures and many a woman who flatters herself that she is too frail to survive a day's sweeping or washing yet puts forth as much exertion in some "physical training" manual of arms as a maid of all work exerts in her lawful occupation. In other days, occasionally some coarse and brutal male would pass by a charmingly seductive maid with the bald statement that he had no mind to marry a perpetual doctor bill, and perhaps that view had its small share in the eventual reversal of public opinion on the subject of health. At all events, today people surround themselves with the atmosphere of health. They want to be well, and they even regard ill-health as a species of crime to be legislated against. In "Faith and Health," which, like the others of Dr. Brown's books, comes from the press of the T. Y. Crowell Co., he is pulling with, not against the stream.

A Cowboy Story

The cowboy is the prevailing fad in juvenile literature and a very good fad it is, too, when the subject is properly treated. Mary K. Maule is a new name, and if this be her first essay she has acquitted herself remarkably well. The story will appeal to the children of larger growth, the older boys and girls and the adults, though the younger ones will have their interest aroused and their curiosity stimulated by the half dozen illustrations and the cover design by Maynard Dixon—no less. The author evidently knows her ground and her characters. "The Little Knight of the X Bar B." was a mysterious waif brought to the cattle ranch in Wyoming by its rough and masterful owner. He introduced the child to his "punchers" as his own nephew, the son of a sister living in the east, and declared that the boy was being spoiled by over indulgence and was sent out to him to be trained into manliness. The little fellow, who was about seven years old, was evidently delicately bred, and the story was too preposterous for contradiction, even if, underneath the coarse outer clothing he had not been found clad in silk stockings and fine linen. Still, Buck had infused such terror into his little charge that not a word could be coaxed or surprised from him with regard to his name or his former home. He became at once the pet of the ranch, and the cowboys took delight in teaching him the arts and crafts of their profession, even outfitting him in a complete rig, and as soon as he was able to endure the fatigue, they took him on the round-ups and to their festivals, intent on showing off their treasure. The child at first pined for his home and his mother, but his one disastrous attempt to run away convinced him of the futility of such an undertaking, and he settled down to make the best of things where he was. It was not until eight years later that he learned the story of his abduction and the reason which had led Bill Buck to be a party to the crime, and went back to his mother, who had believed him to be dead. Another change in his fortunes made him the owner of the cattle ranch where he had spent so many years, and the men who had been father and mother and big brothers and schoolmasters to him became his partners. Nine times out of ten a story with such a plot is ruined by sentimental mawkishness and pious reflections out of character in its adults and impossible in a child, to say nothing of the weariness they are to readers anxious to go on with the tale. Mrs. Maule has made no such mistake. After the first few days, Jack settles down to accept the inevitable and trains his puppy, learns to care for his pony and help Johnny, the cook, in his work, and an eight-year-old, who attempts to run away and gets lost in the hills at night and shoots and kills a mountain lion, not to mention his other adventures in the blizzard, etc., is surely not apt to find life monotonous. The boys will be sure to like another book with no girls in it, while the girls have never yet expressed aversion to a book about boys, so "The Little Knight of the X Bar B." will be welcome to both. Lothrop, Lee and Shepard are its sponsors.

"Show me a man who isn't always skulking behind a woman's skirts," demanded the miltant suffragette.

"How about the fellow who sings in the chorus?" inquired a coarse brute in the rear of the hall.

The city government of Alameda places its seal of approval upon the Bay Cities Water Company's proposition.

`Ire of
e City Council

Alameda, California, June 18, 1910.

To the Honorable the City Council of the City of Alameda.

Gentlemen:

Your Committee consisting of your Mayor and the Public Utilities Committee, with the assistance of our City Engineer, I. N. Chapman, and A. Bannister, Civil Engineer, have taken up every phase of the proposition made by the Bay Cities Water Company to your Honorable Body. The engineers have gone over the water-sheds and have had access to government reports, together with many private reports, all of which have been instrumental in helping them to make a most thorough and reliable investigation.

We find that there is an ample and splendid supply of water. Quality primarily and quantity secondly is exactly what the City of Alameda needs. We cannot look too favorably on this question. The Bay Cities Water Company, as you know, have agreed to install a distributing system, the cost of which, at the present time will be approximately $400,000. We cannot see our way clear to recommend a call for a bond election, which would entail the spending of this amount at this time. Many questions arise which make this decision imperative.

The Bay Cities Water Company agree to enter our city, canvass the field and feel sanguine that within six months time, they can procure enough customers to consume a million and a half gallons of water daily. Enough custom will be solicited at once to enable them to start the installation of the distributing system before this time. After installing their plant and placing it in perfect working order, they agree, then, to allow the City of Alameda to purchase it at cost, plus reasonable interest upon the investment and sell the City of Alameda the water wholesale at a price of $175 per million gallons, which, on the face of it, appeals to us as a good business proposition.

Therefore, we recommend that this Council approve and lend their support to the Bay Cities Water Company, to the end that this excellent and abundant supply of water may be distributed throughout our city. It will fill a long felt want and is one grand opportunity, which should be anxiously grasped, as another one may never present itself.

Very truly yours,
W. H. NOY,
Mayor of Alameda.
WM. HAMMOND, Jr.,
Chairman Public Utilities Committee.

The People and the Primary

No man knoweth what the people of this State will think of the direct primary after they have had sufficient experience to enable them to arrive at a just estimate of its worth. But at the coming primary election we shall learn just how eager the people are to rule. Repeatedly we have been told that the people were disgusted with the old method of chosing their servants, and that they longed for the substance as well as the form of the elective franchise. We shall soon learn just how enthusiastic the people are about the increase of power that they have exacted from the politicians. The indications are that fully twenty-five per cent of the qualified voters of the State will not register and the probability is that considerably less than sixty per cent of those that register will go to the polls. If such prove to be the case it will be evident enough that the people of California are not so deeply concerned with the affairs of government as the demagogues would have us believe. But the truth is as experience proves voting is never a popular pastime and the apathy of the people is in proportion to the number of elections. There were between 20,000 and 25,000 voters in Athens where elections were of frequent occurrence, and not more than six thousand votes were ever polled in that city. On some of the most vital questions ever submitted to a people a large proportion of electors abstained from voting. Out of a total registered vote of 10,203,428 in France there were more than two million who did not vote on the question, Shall or shall not Louis Napoleon Bonaparte assume the imperial crown? In South Carolina less than two-thirds of the people voted on the question, Shall or shall not the State secede from the Union? In our own city of San Francisco we have seen the most strenuous efforts made to stir up public interest on the question of municipal ownership. and we have seen the city committed to the pet project of the demagogues by a minority of the electorate. It appears that while the people are fond of power they do not care to be preoccupied with the exercise of it. The consequence is that the greater the power with which the people are vested the greater becomes the influence of the artful politicians by whom the business of the people is managed.

The Principle of Statesmanship

How characteristic of the Colonel was his message to a member of the New York legislature with reference to the direct primary. "I believe the people demand it," he wrote; "I most earnestly hope it will be enacted into law." Here we have a perfect, a most lucid epitome of the Colonel's philosophy of the science of politics and government. In the words quoted the Colonel succinctly defines what he conceives to be the first and last duty of the American statesman; which is to persuade himself that the people demand something and then to do that very thing. Old fashioned persons who have faith in the teachings of the Founders, who believe that the highest duty of a statesman is to guard the people against their own folly whatever be the consequence to himself, will doubtless regard the rule enunciated by the Colonel as heretical and pernicious. But it should be remembered that the Colonel is himself a founder; that he is the great Apostle of Innovation, the Champion of a new philosophy, scornful of the old and vituperated system of things and resolved to give the people their head. His conception of statesmanship is grounded in a theory that has always been upheld by the idols of the people—the theory that the voice of the people is the voice of God. The maxim that to govern people for their own good they must not be governed by their own ignorance is excluded from the Colonel's philosophy. He holds that there is no such thing as the ignorance of the people. Nor does he heed the suggestion that when half a dozen grasshoppers under a fern make the circumambient ring with their importunate chink whilst thousands of cattle reposing beneath the trees chew their cud in silence one might fall into the error of assuming that those who make the noise are the only inhabitants of the field. The Colonel insists that it is impossible to be mistaken about the voice of the people. He believes that the Divinity that inspires the people raises up prophets to divine the popular sentiment. Hence the rule for the guidance of statesmen: Follow the people not as a coachman follows his horses having a tight grip on the reins and guiding them, but wherever they may lead, fully persuaded that government is not a matter of reason and judgment but a matter entirely of will.

Class Legislation Blocked by Taft

Very little has been said in the daily press about the most sensational and gratifying incident of the closing days of the last session of Congress. We refer to an incident in which President Taft figured conspicuously as the successful opponent of one of the most vicious schemes that was ever contrived by Organized Labor. Taking advantage of the cowardice of those Congressmen whose renominations are uncertain Samuel Gompers and other union leaders had got well under way a play to exempt their organizations from the operations of the Sherman anti-trust law. They succeeded in attaching to the civil sundry bill an amendment which provided that none of the money appropriated for the enforcement of the anti-trust law in 1911 should be expended in the prosecution of conspiracies in the nature of labor boycotts. Thus did they seek to induce Congress to discriminate in favor of one class of citizens and against other citizens of the United States. And considerable progress did they make toward the unholy consummation. The amendment was voted down by the Senate but had passed the House. The conferees of the two houses failed to agree, but the lower house by a vote of 152 to 105 instructed their representatives to return to the conference and insist upon the House amendment. President Taft was considerably alarmed over the prospect. He summoned to the White House all of the members of the House and Senate who had been wavering because of their fear of union labor, and as a result of his activity the House recalled the bill from conference and instructed the conferees to agree to the Senate amendment. The vote this time was 138 to 130. Only two speeches were made in the House in opposition to the amendment. One of these was by Congressman Tawney of Minnesota who said that he would give up his seat in Congress rather than vote for a proposition that exempted one class of people from the operations of the criminal law of the country. The other speaker was Representative Madison of Kansas. "Accept this amendment," he said, "and you vote to repeal the law of conspiracy. At the same time you will legalize the secondary boycott. Every man must stand equal before the law, and every man without exception must obey the law." The fact is worth recording that the only speaker in favor of the amendment, Representative Hughes of New Jersey, pleaded in extenuation of his conduct that he was actuated by his reverence for one of the Roosevelt policies. And it is but fair to him to say that when Colonel Roosevelt was President he recommended the enactment of a law exempting laborers from the operations of the anti-trust act. So we may now reflect on what might have happened had the White House been occupied during the recent session by the great Apostle of the Square Deal who preached the principle that it is wrong to make fish of one and fowl of another though all the while in favor of exempting the powerful labor unions from the law that makes it a crime to enter into agreements in restraint of interstate trade.

The Complaisant Press

In all the political history of this country there cannot be found anything approximating in viciousness of tyrannical power the attempt of the leaders of organized labor to coerce Congress into the enactment of legislation designed to nullify a criminal law for their exclusive benefit. Yet how little comment has been provoked by this startling manifestation of a disposition on the part of a very powerful element of the electorate to make right subservient to might! Not less startling than the attempt to accomplish class legislation by means of intimidation are the flashes of silence by which "the palladiums of our liberties" have made luminous their cowardly complaisance. Uproarious is their patriotism whenever they witness manifestations of the power for evil that resides in the predatory plutocracy; by such manifestations is their civic zeal inflamed; the aggressions of a vicious small minority they never fail to reprobate; but when by the despotism of an organized band of bullies the most sacred of the fundamental principles of our government is threatened with extinction the great militant moulders of public opinion abandon the tripod and rush for the cyclone cellar.

A Roosevelt Policy Abandoned

Of all the achievements thus far to the credit of President Taft none entitles him to the measure of credit that he won by his timely and successful opposition to the labor union amendment to the sundry civil bill. Since the days of Grover Cleveland no Chief Magistrate has given a finer exhibition of political courage and moral intrepidity. But the President in view of his conduct merits the animadversions of many stern moralists, for he has violated one of the Roosevelt policies. It will be remembered that when the Supreme Court of the United States held the boycott to be a violation of the Sherman act Mr. Roosevelt's attorney-general was asked to prosecute labor unions as he had prosecuted commercial bodies, and that he refused to do so. Now Mr. Taft's sentiment on this subject is plainly at variance with that of his illustrious predecessor. The expression of Mr. Taft's sentiment was evoked by a telegram from W. S. Carter, president of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Engineers of St. Paul. This is the telegram:

The President:

Press reports of today indicate that you favor using the people's money to prosecute labor in their efforts to better conditions. The 798 delegates attending the twelfth biennial convention of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Engineers at St. Paul instruct me to protest against this unjust policy.

Upon receipt of this telegram the President sat down and dictated the following despatch:

W. S. Carter, President Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Engineers, St. Paul, Minn.:

Your despatch of June 22 received, in which you say that reports today indicate that I favor using the people's money to prosecute labor in their efforts to better conditions and you protest against such a policy. I presume you refer to the proposition now before Congress that money appropriated for fiscal year 1911 for enforcement of anti-trust laws and acts to regulate commerce shall no part of it be expended in the prosecution of conspiracies in the nature of boycotts to increase wages, shorten hours or better the condition of labor. The Supreme Court decided that such a boycott is a violation of the Sherman anti-trust law and this proposal is an attempt to withhold the means of prosecuting that law when it is violated by a particular class to be made privileged.

I am entirely opposed to such class legislation. If it was proposed to amend the language of the Sherman anti-trust law itself so as somewhat to narrow its scope that would present a proper question for consideration, but so long as the present anti-trust law remains upon the statute books an attempt to modify its enforcement so as to render immune any particular class of citizens, rich or poor, employers or employees, is improper legislation and in my judgment ought to be opposed by your brotherhood. The laboring man and the trade unionist, if I understand him, asks only equality before the law. Class legislation and unequal privilege, though expressly in his favor, will in the end work no benefit to him or to society. —Wm. H. Taft.

President Taft has done no preaching on the evil of making fish of one class of citizens and fowl of another, but in view of his recent action we need have no doubt of his ability to apprehend and appreciate the principle enunciated in that ancient platitude.

Socialism Versus Christianity

The Socialists of New York have worked themselves into a high state of indignation because the Socialist minister of the Church of the Ascension was ousted from the pulpit on account of a tendency to preach politics in preference to religion. The Socialists of New York are unreasonable. Why should the members of a church be expected to pay a man to supply them with something they don't want? The answer of the Socialists is that Socialism is Christianity and that therefore it is proper for it to be preached in a Christian church. But how can they be sure that Socialism is Christianity? The Socialists themselves do not agree as to what Socialism is. And certainly not many of them will argue that it is a philosophy of religion. For one thing we can be sure—that Socialists are not concerned about the welfare of the soul. They are concerned chiefly about the business of this life. They may argue that Christianity is also concerned about the business of this life, but at least they must admit it is evident from the number of jarring sects that there are many sides to the question as to what are the fundamentals of Christianity. If they are not bigots they will admit that unless we acknowledge the existence of an infallible authority it is tyrannical to deny a man the right to determine for himself the meaning of the philosophy preached by the Founder of the Christian religion. Now the members of the Church of the Ascension have come to an understanding as to what Christianity means, and according to their understanding it is as different from Socialism as botany is from astronomy. They believe that Socialism and Christianity are distinct cults. It is their privilege to hire a man to instruct them in Christianity, and having exercised that privilege it is natural that they should have very positive objections to his attempting to instruct them in Socialism. But singularly enough the Socialists conceiving the attitude of the members of the Church of the Ascension to be a species of intolerance berate them in the most impassioned and violent language. It is for them to realize that their own attitude bespeaks intolerance. They are intolerant of the view of Christianity that is held by the members of the church. But at this we should not be astonished since they have for their leader that half-baked philosopher, Lincoln Steffens, who could see but one side of the graft prosecution. Discussing the subject of the removal of the minister he says: "The church is corrupt. It voices the desires of a part of the people only. It belongs to the same people who control our government and our politics. That's why I am astonished to hear Christianity preached in a church." From which the breadth of the Steffens mentality may easily be gauged. Did ever bigot utter himself in a more intolerant spirit? Was there ever a frenzied fanatic more facile in the selection of the postulates of his furious denunciations?

By Val

Departed soul of song, your lips are mute,
Your harp is broken and its strings are strown:
You who in pain struck music from the lute
Are winged again—say whither have you flown?
Sing back to us who stay and cannot hear—
Sing back the truth and sing in simple phrase.
Is it not true that love should have no fear?
Are paths you walk the paths of earthly ways?
Now you are medicined by death from pain
All your young hopes and vigor are restored;
But can you sing, as you have sung, again?
Is it not true that pain must strike the chord?
Or have you learned a newer symphony?
Perhaps your song is nobler now than when
You, who were skilled in mortal melody
Enthralled with changing moods the hearts of men.

Perspective Impressions

The Reno widow and her weeds are soon parted.

Isn't it about time to organize for the reformation of reformers in self-defense?

The proneness to discover bad habits in your neighbor and good habits in yourself is not a habit conducive to the best results.

Though it is shown both by the school and federal census that San Francisco has not as many children as she ought to have why worry now that Theodore II is a married man in our midst?

Mr. William R. Hearst tells us that war with Japan is inevitable. Well we certainly need a war to divert our attention from the politicians and to produce in us more wholesome emotions than those with which we are at present afflicted.

If what the sporting reporters have been telling us is true the white race must now be in a hopeless condition. But perhaps the ingenious sporting reporters will now tell us that as Mr. Johnson has a white wife we need not despair since the better half of him is Caucasian.

Mr. Hearst's Examiner lamented the death of Chief Justice Fuller in two columns and the defeat of Jeffries in thirteen pages. The worship of justice has never lacked altars, but the sky-line is black with the spires of temples dedicated to the worship of strength.

Let us felicitate ourselves on the fact that San Francisco is one of the few large cities in the United States in which there was no clash between negroes and whites on receipt of the news from Reno. But let us be especially proud of the fact that the news that produced the clashes elsewhere did not emanate from the so-called Paris of America. Hats off to Governor Gillett!

Tiburcio Vasquez the Bandit

Being a Brief Notice of the Criminal Exploits of One of the Most Picturesque Ruffians that California Has Produced, Extracted from a Rare Pamphlet Published in 1875 by Eugene T. Sawyer.

Although Tiburcio Vasquez operated in the vicinity of San Francisco and was hanged in San Jose, his exploits are not nearly as well known to the average San Franciscan as those of Black Bart, Joaquin Murietta, Three-Fingered Jack and Evans and Sontag. Yet Vasquez is as picturesque a figure as any in the criminal annals of the State and the popular sympathy was so aroused during his trial that when he was sentenced to death many women in the courtroom broke down and wept. Not that his career embraced any of the unselfish incidents by which some of the worst robbers and murderers have distracted attention from their viciousness. Vasquez had only one virtue, daring, but his effrontery and engaging personal appearance somehow won the general imagination so that many actually regarded him as some sort of a martyr when the law finally put a rope around his neck.

At the height of his career Vasquez possessed a well-knit, wiry figure and wonderful power of endurance. His complexion was that of a Castilian; his features were clear cut and wore an expression of keen intelligence. To the general observer he appeared quiet and inoffensive with frank and gentlemanly manners. His voice was light and melodious and a smile continually hovered over his face. Perhaps it was his attractive exterior which made him a favorite with women, perhaps his reckless criminality and outlawry had a great deal to do with it. At any rate women played an important part in the life of Vasquez, and one woman had much to do with his death.

Tiburcio Vasquez was born in the town of Monterey in August, 1835. His parents were respectable people and gave him a common school education. Early in life he evinced a distaste for honest toil and a liking for the company of loose men and women. When only sixteen years old he fell in with Anastacio Garcia, a bandit who terrorized Monterey County for quite a while. Perhaps that association inspired Vasquez with the desire for an outlaw's life; at any rate it was the beginning of his career of crime. He joined a gang of horse-thieves and at the age of twenty-two went to serve his first term in San Quentin. He escaped but was recaptured and stayed in prison until August, 1863. In the following year an Italian butcher was murdered at Enriquita and Vasquez acted as interpreter at the inquest, but none of the witnesses for whom he translated seemed to know much about the crime. After the inquest he disappeared and subsequently discovered facts connected him with the crime. It was a Robin Hood trick in a new setting, that of a guilty man interpreting at his victim's inquest.

Two years later we find Vasquez seducing and abducting the beautiful daughter of a man who cared for him after an accident. This was a characteristic exploit; to Vasquez the claims of hospitality meant absolutely nothing. From 1867 until 1871, he was again in State's Prison, having been caught stealing cattle. When he emerged his piercing black eyes, his seductive smile and his soft musical voice had as many charms as ever for the senoras and senoritas and in 1870, having been for some time the guest of one Abelardo Salazar in San Juan, he made conquest of his host's wife and rode off with her. Salazar tried to kill him on their next meeting, but Vasquez escaped with his life and the woman stayed with him till he tired of her.

In the spring of 1871 the bandit began a series of depredations which kept the State in a ferment from Mount Diablo to Los Angeles. With his thorough knowledge of the country the bandit found little difficulty in eluding pursuit and he had so many friends that the most carefully planned hunts failed to surprise him. He robbed the Gilroy and Visalia stage near San Felipe and escaped from the pursuing posse with a bullet through his body. When he recovered from his wound he held up the San Benito stage below Hollister and escaped, though his assistant was captured and lynched. Vasquez never tarried after a crime to help a companion make good his escape; self-preservation was the first law of his nature.

In January of 1873 Vasquez met Abdon Leiva and his wife, Rosaria. As usual he won the woman's heart and through her persuasion Leiva joined the outlaw who was recruiting for a big campaign. By summer time Vasquez had a picked band consisting of Leiva, a French hunchback named De Bert, Moreno, Chavez and Gonzalez. Plans were made to hold-up the Southern Pacific pay train between San Jose and Gilroy, but the plot was betrayed and had to be abandoned. Then followed the worst crime of Vasquez's career, the murderous robbery at Tres Pinos, a few miles below Hollister.

On the 13th of August, 1873, the robbery of Snyder's store, on the Tres Pinos, was first suggested by Vas-

The Countess Camille

By Francis Grierson

(Concluded from Last Week)

The little Baroness laughted with delight as the Countess paused a moment and waved her lace handkerchief with one of those charming gestures of which she had the secret, and I again caught a whiff of the wonderful scent. It seemed to envelop me, and I felt a sensation of exhilaration mingled with a slight drowsiness, and I began to wonder whether this feeling was produced by the perfume or some secret power exerted by this systerious woman.

She continued her story:

"We now entered a smaller room. From the ceiling hung several lamps encased in pure gold filigree. A glow of light fell on a bowl encrusted with opals, set in a basin of malachite.

"'Sit here,' said Kallif, pointing to a pale green divan which the flickering lights rendered all but transparent. He then walked round the room. When he came to the bowl of opal he stopped and looked at it, as if meditating some important act. He then took from his pocket a small bunch of keys, cautiously opened the lid and took out a phial. Then facing me, he said: 'First I shall let you inhale a little of this extract, for not till then will you be able to understand what I have to show you.' I heard a slight click when he opened the phial, and almost on the instant a wave of wonderful perfume enveloped me. In another moment the room seemed laden with the fascinating odor, and with it, I thought I heard a far off music as of harps. Gradually I became reconciled to the strange influence of the room, and my terror vanished.

"Kallif now walked slowly to the opal bowl, and replaced the phial. He came once again and stood beside me, and, with a curious gleam in his eyes, he whispered:

"'Musk, sandal-wood, attar of roses.'

"'Yes,' I said, 'but that is not all!'

"'Ah,' he replied, 'the fourth ingredient must remain a mystery; but if ever you do guess it the secret will be yours. Remain where you are, and do not move,' he continued, as he walked to the far end of the apartment.

"I saw him unlock a small casket and take out something, carrying it in his hand as he again came towards me.

"He unfolded some tissue-paper and held before me a crystal-like stone of unique shape, bordered with rubies and black diamonds. He held it out before me, and I gazed into it. Suddenly he grasped my left hand and placed the stone in it. I shuddered as something like an electric shock passed through my arm, and just as I was about to express my surprise, Kallif bent his head down close to mine, and looking into my eyes, said with a significant gesture:

"'You see it is an agate!'

"Instantly I thought of his agate eye. I looked at the eye, then at the stone; they were exactly the same color. As I moved it, the black diamonds darted fire such as I had never seen from jewels.

"And now the old life had passed away, and a world of romance was before me. Define it all I could not, nor did I wish to try.

"Kallif took the agate stone and put it under lock and key once more, and said in a careless manner, 'I think you now understand that I only want your aid; you will assist me in my work at Constantinople.'

"He led me back to my own apartments where the woman Minka was awaiting me. This woman I had almost begun to like; she seemed very kind, but to confide in her I did not dare.

"A few days after that eventful evening, we started for Constantinople, Minka being my constant companion. Kallif had now gained complete control over my mind. But I did not fear him; it was a sort of indifference I now felt.

"Arrived at Constantinople, I found myself in a dream-palace that seemed to have been erected on the plan of some Arabian Nights entertainment, so varied, so surprising, so bewitching was every room. Kallif took me all through it one evening soon after our arrival, and the moment I stepped outside my own suite of apartments, I was lost in the bewildering mazes of arabesque walls and elusive doors hung with extraordinary curtains worked in weird designs leading anywhere or nowhere."

"But were you not afraid that he would sew you up in a sack some night and have you thrown into the Bosphorus?" asked the Baroness, in her childlike way.

"Wonder had taken the place of fear," replied the Countess Camille simply. "There was a mystery about all the mazes of the palace which I was dying to solve, and I was certain this house had no equal in Constantinople.

"One never-to-be-forgotten evening Kallif had the whole palace illuminated for the reception of some great and distinguished visitors. There was that unearthly shimmering effect, that serene glow and fascinating glamour about everything from ceiling to floor that I had witnessed in Vienna, but spread out here through whole suites of apartments with unnumbered lights and illusions unknown at the Austrian mansion.

"Kallif informed me that among the guests would be a Russian diplomat from whom he must get some important state secrets, and that I must aid him. He feared, however, the influence of a certain Fakir and a hunchbacked companion of his whom the Russian insisted on having present that evening, as he was much interested in the study of the occult.

"Kallif commanded me that I should dress on this particular evening in a semi-Oriental gown of rose pink. He gave me emeralds for my hair and arms, and I wondered why these jewels were to be worn alone; but Kallif had a reason for everything, and this was no exception. When my maids had finished my toilette, he came to conduct me to the room he had chosen for the reception. On we went, through turnings that led from one enchanting scene to another, and when we arrived at the appointed room Kallif gave a wave of his hand, as much as to say, 'here it is.'

"He went away for a time, and I sank into a divan, in a dream of ecstasy at the sight all about me. The room was of emerald-green, and that was why I was commanded to wear emeralds, but the pink and opal glow of the curiously wrought hanging lamps reflected a pale rose-color on the shell-like ceiling, which, in turn, threw a sheen on the splendid rugs and divans, and in the midst of all I stood with my pale rose-gown and my jewels, as if I had been created for the room. I looked to see if I could distinguish the door through which we had entered. It was impossible.

"Kallif now returned, and as he approached me I noticed a faint smile on his hard, cynical lips; he made a motion for me to rise. He led me a little way towards the middle of the room where the lights seemed to merge in a soft mystic glow. He pronounced some words in Turkish or Arabic which I did not understand, made a gesture in the air with his hands, and fastened in my hair, what do you think? The agate crystal with its rubies and black diamonds! There I was, with a talisman on

Friar Lands Investigation

It was a great surprise to most observers when in the closing hours of Congress the Insular Affairs Committee of the House ordered an investigation of the sale of the Friar lands in the Philippines. It was not thought that anything would be done in this matter during the session. The resolution adopted calls for "a thorough investigation of the Interior Department of the Philippine Government touching the administration of Philippine lands and all matters of fact and law pertaining thereto, whether the same are to be had in the United States, the Philippine Islands or elsewhere, and to report to this Congress." It will be remembered that when Representative Martin of Colorado first made public his allegations of corrupt dealing in the Friar lands his charges made a great sensation. They implicated Frank W. Carpenter, executive secretary of the Philippine Government who, it was stated, had leased 5,000 acres of Friar lands and purchased 17,000 acres. Martin further charged that 3,000 acres of the Friar lands had been leased for a period of twenty-five years for twenty cents an acre per annum to E. L. Worcester, a nephew of Dean C. Worcester, the Philippine Secretary of the Interior. The resolution denounced these transactions as "so criminally corrupt and immoral as to constitute malfeasance in office." The investigation is bound to be sensational.

An Insurgent Complication

The national insurgents are very much confused over the situation in Massachusetts where Representative Butler Ames, a red hot insurgent, who has announced his candidacy for the Unite States Senate in opposition to Senator Henry Cabot Lodge will not only be opposed by the powerful State machine but by Colonel Theodore Roosevelt, the warm personal friend of Lodge, as well. The colonel, of course, is the idol of insurgent worship, so it is a hard pill for them to swallow. It is said that Colonel Roosevelt will make at least one speech during the approaching campaign in behalf of his fellow-author Lodge. Commenting on this rumor which seems to have ample verification Butler Ames has said: "It is hard to believe that the ex-president will lend himself to the political support of one, even though a friend, who has consistently violated in Massachusetts all the moral teachings of which he is the great exponent." At the same time the fact that Senator Lodge should have appealed to the colonel for personal assistance is taken as an indication of the tight hole he is in with an opponent like Butler Ames trying conclusions.

A New Kind of Pygmies

The greatest interest has been aroused in scientific circles by the discovery by the expedition of the British Ornithologists' Union of a new pygmy race in New Guinea. The explorers are cut off from all communication, but it is supposed that, according to their program, they had commenced the ascent of the Charles Louis Mountains running east and west of Dutch New Guinea, and that it was here they made their discovery, which absolutely upsets all preconceived ideas, anthropologists having held that pygmies were not to be looked for among the Papuans. Further particulars published in The Times state that the average height of the pygmies is four feet three inches. They are very dark ("the color of a newly blacked stove"), with broad noses, frizzly hair growing in "peppercorn" tufts, and long arms. They are of the Negrito race, which was only previously known to exist in the Andamans, the northern districts of the Malay States, and in parts of the Philippines. They are nomadic hunters and experts in the use of poisoned arrows and in the construction of a kind of spring gun for the capture of game. They are a "merry little people," very hospitable, not cannibals, and apparently monogamous. The party is one of the most important scientific expeditions of its kind despatched from England for many years. Organized by the British Ornithologists' Union and the Royal Geographical Society, its object was the exploration of the largest unknown area on the earth's surface—an area as large as Great Britain and Ireland and France together.

A Catholic Tuskegee

The Catholic church in this country plans the foundation in the South of a national Catholic industrial school modeled on the Tuskegee Institute of Booker Washington. The project was discussed at the annual meeting of the Catholic Board for Mission Work among the Colored People over which Cardinal Gibbons presided. Father John E. Burke, director general of negro mission work, having formerly administered a negro parish in New York, was picked out as the most competent person to plan the new foundation and he will soon make a tour of Alabama and Mississippi for the purpose of picking out a site for the institute. There is a good deal of money available for the new project but Father Burke hopes to establish an annual fund of $100,000, to be contributed largely by the young Catholics of the country. The whole scheme is indirectly a tribute to the success of Booker Washington.

Power Sites a State Heritage

A great deal of serious consideration is being given to a speech delivered in the closing week of Congress on the subject of the conservation bill by Senator Borah of Idaho. Taking a position diametrically opposed to that of Gifford Pinchot and his followers Senator Borah dwelt upon the argument that the equality guaranteed by the Constitution to all the States would be destroyed by the demands of the extreme advocates of conservation. "If Illinois or Massachusetts," argued Senator Borah, "receives thousands or even millions of dollars as a revenue for its water power and Idaho receives nothing, but on the other hand, pays thousands or millions into the Federal Treasury, is there equality among the States? The old States make these power sites a source of incalculable revenue out of which to pay the expenses of the State and lessen the general taxes. But we must not only pay our taxes but in addition this revenue to the general Government." Senator Borah emphatically indorsed th policy of regulating these sources of power to prevent waste, extravagance and monopoly; but the "policy of strangulation of the great West" he as emphatically denounced.

As to the Big Fight

Any occasion which causes thousands to congregate, whether it be a Shakespearian play at the Greek Theater in Berkeley or the lynching of a negro in Georgia is worthy of serious consideration. If for this reason alone I would scorn to be of those who display an affectation of indifference toward the prizefight in Reno. While for obvious reasons the pugilistic battle had nothing in common with the lynching of a negro, it certainly had many points of contact with a Shakespearian tragedy. That is one of the reasons why it appealed very strongly to me, but I do not hesitate to say that the principal reason is the pleasure I take in seeing two fighters trying conclusions. (I never in my life helped separate street-corner fighters unless one was a bully and obviously out of his opponent's class.) Like most other men I enjoy a scrap; probably more than a great many men I enjoy a great spectacle; so I would gladly submit to the discomforts of another trip to Reno or elsewhere to see such a spectacle as that of last Monday afternoon. If it had been a better fight I should have enjoyed it more; if after a rattling good battle Jeffries had won I should have enjoyed it most of all. From which it may be gathered that if not a fight fan I am at least orthodox in my sporting creed.

It was Very Dramatic

In many respects the fight might be compared with a tragedy at the Greek Theater. The arena held a tremendously large crowd. Everyone knew he was there to witness a dramatic event but of course it was only at the conclusion that this dramatic event proved to have been a tragedy. Speaking for myself, I was never so keyed up with excitement at the beginning of any play as I was when Jim Jeffries and Jack Johnson entered the ring. I imagine that a great many more who, like myself, had no money wagered on the result, nevertheless felt just the same way. It was a natural feeling. Here were a black and a white giant facing each other, waiting the signal to start the contest which had been one of our staple subjects of conversation for months past. We knew for a certainty that the battle would occupy an important chapter in the future annals of fistiana, much more certainly than we ever know that any particular player in any particular play will be remembered beyond a decade. A world's championship, whether it be in chess or fisticuffs, is not to be sneered at. It was a great thing to be present and any man who, being present, did not breathe the atmosphere of the occasion had wasted his time in coming. It was real drama from its slow and cautious start to its startling climax. I wish any player had the power to overwhelm me as I was overwhelmed when Jeffries toppled for the first time beneath Johnson's blows. I could hardly believe my eyes. It seemed like a bad dream. To think that that wonderful fellow had at last met his superior! And yet the climax had come with the inevitability of all true tragedy. There was no other way out of it. With the relentlessness of fate the black pugilist had exhausted the possibilities of his science and strength in humbling the pride of the white. The picture of Jeffries hanging out of the ring is one which will never be erased from my mind.

Some of the Other Actors

If I had the pen of Pierce Eagan or William Hazlitt, if I could write as Carleton wrote when he gave us "The Dead Boxer" or as George Borrow wrote when he described the humiliation of the Flaming Tinman I might attempt to vie with the sporting writers in a description of the fight. I prefer to criticize some of the minor actors, the stars having been thoroughly discussed. There was Jim Corbett, for instance. It struck me that he cut an amusing figure, but of course tragedy must have its low comedy relief. Jim got decidedly the worst of it in some of his repartee with Jack Johnson but never lost his amiability. Between the rounds he visited Johnson's corner and pretended to study the fighter's condition. But as Jeffries failed to hurt the negro Corbett's teasing was in vain. More effective was the part played by Joe Choynski whose duty it was to jolly the bruised and disheartened white man, to keep his eye open and to stop the flow of blood. The eagerness with which most of the pugilists took the limelight with Billy Jordan before the fight began was very amusing. Even Philadelphia Jack O'Brien had the effrontery to clamber through the ropes and bow; but the crowd would have none of him. John L. Sullivan is clearly the popular idol and next to him, Fitzsimmons. Tom Sharkey is a joke to everybody. I never got such a good look at his celebrated cauliflower ear. It is the greatest anatomical curiosity I have ever seen. Billy Muldoon is nearly as handsome today as when he was the champion wrestler and rumor said that Kate Forsythe who played Rosalind in the "As You Like It" to which he contributed his wrestling skill was infatuated with him. Evidently he has not learned much wisdom from Elihu Root and other distinguished patrons of his, otherwise he would never have made that foolish speech about "the only free State in the Union."

The Literary Experts

Doubtless many people who have been reading the articles signed by Sullivan, Corbett, Muldoon and others have suspected that they were not the real authors of these effusions. They were not. John L. Sullivan's articles were written by "Wurra Wurra" McLoughlin, the sporting editor of the New York World; Corbett's by a very clever youngster named Brown, also of the World; Muldoon's were the work of C. E. Van Loan of the Hearst contingent; while Freddie Hewitt, formerly of this city but now of the Chicago Inter Ocean, was responsible for "Bat" Masterson's. Even Battling Nelson who regards himself as a litterateur was not averse from seeking assistance. It was not easy work, this composing articles for the old-timers. Van Loan complained that when he sought Muldoon for material the former wrestler would begin, "Thirteen years ago" and fall into a revery. Van declared that these three words represented the only material he ever received from Muldoon, but of course even newspapermen are not free from the vice of exaggeration. It is not necessary to point out that newspapermen did not write the special articles signed by Jack London, Rex Beach, Alfred Henry Lewis and other blown-in-the-bottle novelists. If they had those articles would have been of vastly better quality.

The Judges of Form

I don't suppose any previous ring contest developed so great an aggregation of cock-sure judges of physical form as this one did. Men who are paid large salaries by metropolitan dailies for their services as sporting editors and writers filled colmns with descriptions of Jeffries' superb physical condition and with arguments to prove his invulnerability. Very few had the courage to set down in cold type their final judgment of the comparative chances of the two fighters, but most of those who did picked out Jeffries as the better man. I recall few who showed themselves experts in more than name, but "Tad" of the Hearst papers, Ben Benjamin of the Chronicle, and M. Georges Dupuy of the Paris Figaro were of this scanty company. Here is a situation which raises a question of competence. Should not others besides these few have been able by observation to learn what Jeffries' real condition was? Was their judgment faulty or did they allow prejudice to run away with them? Of one thing I am sure. Henceforth I shall not put my trust in experts but shall trust to my own inexpert observation. Then I will be spared the disappointment I suffered when Jeffries, the so-called "bear man," went through the ropes.

Sullivan on the Passion Play

Big Tim Sullivan's pugilistic utterances have figured at great length in the despatches from Reno, but I am much more interested in his remarks on the Passion Play at Oberammergau. The New York State Senator came direct from Europe to Reno to act as stake-holder at the fight and regaled some of his friends at the Golden with an original criticism of the Tyrolean religious spectacle. "I went to Oberammergau to see the Passion Play," he began. "I wish I had stayed longer in Ireland. The play from a religious standpoint may be all right, but as a spectacle it does not amount to much. The local talent, if gathered together and brought to New York, would not make a very long run even at the Metropolitan Opera House. I have been to Coney Island, but the simple villagers over there have adopted Coney Island methods, and in a German setting they lose nothing. The innkeepers charge you $6.50 a day for accommodations which can be furnished on the Bowery for 75 cents a day. Indeed, Bowery accommodations at that price have the Bavarian accommodations beaten by a city block. You have to pay two days in advance, and as soon as you are safely landed they begin overcharging in a way that would do credit to a get-rich-quick game. Not many Americans had arrived when I was there, but the simple natives were preparing for them. When the play is over there ought to be enough money in that section to allow many to retire, build castles, and buy titles. Everybody has a hook out for the expected American invasion."

He Talked and He Talked

Justice Lorrigan of the Supreme Court made a record for long winded post-prandial speechmaking last Saturday night on the occasion of the banquet given in his honor at the Vendome by the San Jose bar. Though "the event of the evening" Justice Lorrigan was not given an opening until twenty minutes before midnight, but he was then in fine fettle, and he talked until almost two o'clock in the morning. He was in reminiscent mood, and despite the lateness of the hour nobody went to sleep. The judge kept his audience awake with some good stories, one of which was about a case that he failed to win when practicing at the bar. He was defending a man charged with a serious crime. Having great faith in his ability as an orator he talked to the jury for a day and a half, and his client was convicted. Amazed at the verdict he asked one of the jurors how it was that he had become convinced that the man was guilty. "Well," said the juror, "the evidence wasn't very strong, but you talked and talked, and somehow you didn't seem to get anywhere, and so I concluded that there was a reasonable doubt of your client's innocence."

Shortridge for the Bench

Up from San Jose comes the news that Charles M. Shortridge, statesman, journalist, lawyer and philosopher is about to conquest a new field. After a brief experience at the San Jose bar it has occurred to him that the bench of the Santa Clara Valley is in need of a little more of the judicial temperament and that he has some to contribute. This happy thought came to him partly as a result of his experience in the court presided over by Judge Welch where he was fined some time ago, and partly as a result of Judge Welch's unique conception of the principles of justice and the rules of evidence. Judge Welch has been reversed so often that the taxpayers of the prune belt have been put to considerable expense for new trials, and with commendable public spirit Charley Shortridge has resolved to put an end to the drain on their pockets. I hear that his resolution meets with the approval of a majority of the members of the bar.

"What a beautiful costume, dear!"
"Do you like it?"
"Oh, my dear, I love it. It's just too hideously fashionable for words.

Spalding for Senator

Lost is the World's Fair to San Diego, but perhaps there is to be compensation in the honor of giving to the nation a senator. For San Diego commends to our consideration Al. Spalding, the father of his nation's preeminent pastime. Breathes there a man with soul so dead as to be unconscious of the mortal cinch that Al. Spalding has on almost any job that he might care to fill? The love of the Spalding is a national sentiment, first at some time or other in the hearts of every mother's son of us. What delicious memories cluster about the name that has been a household word in the United States for lo, these forty years! How many voters in California, think you, will read on election day the name of the giant twirler of the original Chicago White Stockings without letting their memories wander vacant-lotwards to the halcyon days of virile youth, to that gladdest season of life when there were no illusions and all the joys of existence were experienced through the divine combination of a Spalding ball and a Spalding bat. And who can think of those darling implements of our earliest and cleanest rivalries without a touch of something akin to poetic reverence for the man who will be forever identified with our sweetest traditions! There are few things that we do in this life less grudgingly than those which are done for old-time's sake. And certainly a large majority of us feel that there is a very close connection between old-time's sake and Al. Spalding's. Therefore the prospect of compensation ahead for the world's fairless city to the ultimate south of us.

The Diamond School

Wellington is reported to have said that Waterloo was won on the cricket field at Eton. In a similar sense most of the glorious triumphs of Americans were won on the diamond. It was on the diamond where every boy is a unit in his little world that many a successful American acquired the qualities of self-reliance, pluck and perseverance. On the diamond the love of fair play was first instilled in the breast of many an American youth. There too innumerable American citizens received their first lessons in justice as administered by the umpire from whom there is no appeal. By the rules of the game they were taught to be not impatient of justice, or, at least, to bear with the infirmities of human judgment to the extent of never impugning the integrity of the sole arbiter. And so while it is the sacred prerogative of every rooter to kick at the rank decisions of the fallible one his impartiality is never questioned. In Al. Spalding we have a fine specimen of the kind of manhood that is fashioned in the dust and sweat of the turbulent ball field. And to Al. Spalding we are indebted in a very great measure for the preservation through the years of the pristine purity of the noble sport. He it was that nursed the game in its evolution from primitive rounders to its present state of perfection. Its fundamental rules he formulated, its finest traditions he helped to make.

The One Disadvantage

So. Al. Spalding starts in the senatorial race with some advantages that his only competitor Judge Works will not find it easy to offset. The only disadvantage from which he may be thought to be suffering is money which he made out of baseball. Though never officially included among the malefactors of great wealth, it may nevertheless be considered unfortunate for him in these piping times of prejudice against the predatory rich that he has a fortune of many millions. This circumstance, however, may be employed for argumentative purposes for or against him with almost equal facility and cogency according to the state of mind to which the argument is addressed. Much depends on whether Mr. Spalding will endeavor to show that he is not inseparable from his wealth. It has been reported that he intends to make a noiseless campaign, one absolutely devoid of the gladsome sound of sound money. It is to be hoped that the report is exaggerated. There is many an old codger with whom the remembrance of his baseball days is but a sigh, who will be grateful to Al. Spalding for awakening in him memories of those vanished hours that are never included in the days of wasted time; but will he not also be disposed to doubt that the candidate for senator is really and truly the man that used to pitch for the original White Stockings? Mr. Spalding must loosen up to dissipate incredulity among the plain people.

Rich But Repentant

Some callous persons there are who regard the money-making faculty as not at all incompatible with the senatorial essentials so long as it is accompanied by the money-spending habit. Indeed there are persons who regard the combination of the faculty and the habit as conclusive of sanity and conservatism. So after all it is in Mr. Spalding's power to appeal to two classes of the electorate—those who are susceptible to the influence of sentiment and those who measure ability in terms of the counting-house. And let it be said incidentally that so far as can be ascertained Mr. Spalding accumulated his money with a reasonable degree of respect for his conscience. But of course millions of money are prima facie evidence of a conscience cultivated up to some measure of grateful resilience. It is not therefore to be contended that "Pop" Anson's old partner has remained immaculate since quitting the slab. It goes without saying that he is not as honest as that lonesome poor man, the beloved of the idealists, who has never broken the golden rule. But there is to be said in his favor, that unlike most American millionaires he got tired of the sordid business of his post-diamond career, turned it over to his sons, and by picking out a garden spot for the home of his declining years made it evident that commerce had not utterly extinguished his capacity for appreciating the delights of a soulful leisure.

"What I want," said the young man, "is to get married and have a quiet and peaceful home of my own."

"Well," replied the man who knew, "sometimes it works that way, and sometimes it's like joining a debating society."

A Peck of Vulgarity

Professor Harry Thurston Peck, lately of Columbia College, has been found out. Considered for years a gentleman and a scholar he has at this late day exposed himself to all who care to look at a very vulgar little person. It all came of a suit for breach of promise and the consequent publication of a batch of love letters. The love letters which Peck wrote to his inamorata were not of any particular literary value but they flamed with

Do you know what Quality means in a Turkish Cigarette? If not get a box of "MILO." Then, any other cigarette, and try same, side by side. You'll note the delicate, aromatic mildness of the "MILO." Mildness (yet with the richness in flavor) is what costs in Turkish Tobacco, and its just this that makes the Perfect Cigarette. You'll find it in No Other.

This perfection is obtained only by owning our own plantation in Turkey—the careful watchfulness from the seeding to the finished article.

the erotic fires of middle-age adoration and naturally evoked guffaws wherever they were read. Now Peck is not singular in writing indiscreet letters; most of us have done exactly the same thing and the professor might well say, Let him that is without offense laugh first. A better course would have been for the professor to maintain silence, exactly the course which he did not follow. As a result of the whole miserable business he was asked to vacate his Latin chair at Columbia and immediately retorted with a mean attack upon President Nicholas Murray Butler. Some time ago the New York Sun, a most irreverent paper, referred to Peck as "the coprophagous editor of the Bookman." That is a most objectionable adjective to apply to any man but as Peck's literary activities have consisted largely in raking the muck of literary lives, it was perhaps deserved. Perhaps Peck's favorite studies caused the deterioration in his character; perhaps Petronius, whom he translated, corrupted him. At any rate Peck stands discredited, a peck of vulgarity, nothing more.

Rudolph May Leave Us

A vagrant rumor has been current during the week that the Hon. Rudolph Spreckels, the first and last hope of Californian reformers, may soon fill the State with mixed emotions by announcing his permanent withdrawal from this scene of his most virtuous activities. Mr. Spreckels, so the story goes, feels that he should not confine his efforts as a reformer to a single State. Calls have come to him from all sections of the Union to get in behind the national movement for civic regeneration, to fight for the supremacy of the higher ideals shoulder to shoulder with J. Rudolph Garfield, "Battle Bob" La Follette, Gifford Pinchot and the other paphlagonians and proponents of the New Idea. And it is said that he has given ear to these calls, and that he has about concluded to take up his headquarters in Washington, D. C., and there finance and direct the big movement. There will certainly be joy at the Capital when Mr. Spreckels takes his leg there and corresponding thereto in volume will be the mourning of the bereaved ones at home. But Mr. Spreckels has not yet decided to leave us. His future course depends on the gubernatorial contest. He will take no revolutionary step for the present.

Another Guess About "The Sybarite"

The identity of "The Sybarite" who recently wrote for Town Talk a series of papers entitled "The Physician at the Supper Table" is still keeping our readers guessing. The following paragraph is from the last issue of "The Spectator" of Los Angeles:

Truman and Ainsworth?

San Francisco Town Talk has just concluded a series of talks by a sybarite—and about the best series of papers that has been published in California in many a long day. All over California people who have been reading these papers have been guessing as to their authorship. I am as much entitled as any one for a try, even though Town Talk will not reveal the name of the writer. My guess is that those papers are the work of Major Ben C. Truman and that the physician referred to in them is Dr. Ainsworth of the Southern Pacific. Will Town Talk attest the correctness of this?

In reply to this I can only say that it is impossible for me to announce the name of the author of the papers until I obtain his permission to do so. When they were contributed it was with the understanding that his anonymity should be preserved. Some of my readers may not know "The Spectator" of Los Angeles. It is a new weekly paper of alert and breezy tendencies conducted by Mr. Winfield Scott who used to be prominent in local newspaperdom. Mr. Scott edited the Los Angeles "Graphic" for some time and edited it well. Since his withdrawal the paper has been moribund.

"What made you so late?"

"I met Jinx."

"Well, that's no reason why you should be an hour late getting home to supper."

"I know, but I asked him how he was feeling, and the fool insisted on telling me."

Alfred Henry Lewis, Autoplagiarist

Plagiarism is not a rare crime, but autoplagiarism, which perhaps is no crime at all, is certainly uncommon. Oscar Wilde set a precedent in this practice, "lifting" from himself poetic images and dainty phrases, but with all his courage and contempt for conventionality he never had the boldness that has been exhibited by Alfred Henry Lewis in the gentle art of filching from his own published works to lighten the burdens of authorship. I feel that it is worth while calling attention to the virtuosity of Lewis in wholesale repetition because of a most curious circumstance. In 1901 Lewis published his Life of Richard Croker. Now it is on this work that he has made large drafts for the purpose of eking out his "Story of Roosevelt" in the June number of the magazine called Human Life. How remarkable that Lewis with his thoughts concentrated on the greatest moralist of the age should have received the inspiration which sent him back nine years in quest of material that was con-

TELEPHONING TO THE COUNTRY

THE City and Country are bound together by the telephone line.

The farmer and his family use the rural telephone constantly, calling up each other and the market town on all sorts of matters and for all sorts of supplies and information.

City people also find the rural telephone of great advantage. A traveler from his room in the hotel talks with the farm folk miles away. Without the telephone he could not reach them.

The farmer himself may travel far and still talk home over the Long Distance Lines of the Bell System.

ceived while pondering the life of the Tammany boss. I will employ the felicitous parallel:

From his "Croker"

This sketch, to say the least, is becoming highly excursive. There will be those of its readers, doubtless, to marvel at its long legs and erratic wanderings. I may as well vouchsafe a syllable of explanation. When I began, after some thought on that point of discursiveness, I took the bridle off and turned my pencil out to pasture. It will graze where God pleases, and where the grass of that moment grows best to its taste. (Page 26).

In dressing the stone, and mixing the mortar, and laying the walls of this story, there shall be but one purpose: The sole, lone target aimed at shall be truth. It may be well to wear this statement in one's mind. A procession of mendacity, in a very lock-step of lies, will follow Richard Croker to the end. It will be marshaled by partisanship, recruited by jealousy, and led by his foes. It is worth while, therefore, since none cuts coupons from any bond of error, to create a place in print where the truth of Richard Croker can be had. This is to be no attack, no defense; it is neither to blame nor to praise. "Sir Oliver," quoth Sir Peter Teazle, "we live in a damned wicked world, and the fewer we praise the better." . . . No, there's to be neither love, nor hate, nor praise, nor censure, nor bouquets, nor brickbats, nor interest personal or political, from one cover to the other. Truth shall be the watchword, first as last. 'Tis a commodity grand, popular, and scarce—that Truth. There's little of it told; there's little of it sold. For which reasons, Truth, where and for what cause it comes to market, should carry that interest and selling quality commonly stated of hot cakes. (Page 3).

It is a fashion when one writes of folk of eminence, advertisement, and power, to plant some space with their pedigrees. Whether the subject be some kinless loon or one rich in ancestry is ever of deep importance; especially in America, emphatically in New York. There are . . . more "Burke's Peerages" sold each year in New York City than in London and all England. There are more carriages to be seen in any New York City day bedight with the coat-armor of the free and democratic American inside, than would roll by one in London in a week. (Pages 3, 4).

It will strike the calmer mind that in this matter of family we have done enough. . . . Campbell, in his "Lives of the Lord Chancellors," deals out the genealogy of his wigged, grave heroes with but a scurvy scantiness. Even in the instance of the bloody Jeffries, about all that Campbell tells one is that Jeffries' father was a Welshman who took early occasion to prophesy a headless ending for his son with block and axe on Tower Hill. . . . Lockhart, in his "Life of Scott," an indomitable work which extends itself in ten volumes, disposes of the "pedigree" and the

In seizing it I am likely to become highly excursive. Also, there will be readers, doubtless, to marvel at my long legs and erratic wanderings. Wherefore I vouchsafe this syllable of explanation. I have resolved to take the bridle off and turn my pencil out to pasture. It shall graze where heaven pleases, and where the grass of that moment grows best to its taste.

In dressing the stone and mixing the mortar and laying the walls of this story, there shall be but one purpose: The sole, lone target aimed at shall be truth. It may be well to wear this statement in one's mind. A procession of mendacity, in a very lock-step of lies, makes up the body of modern biography. Commonly it is marshaled by partisanship, recruited by jealousy, led by ink sycophants who fawn on Money or Place or both. It is worth while, therefore, since none cuts coupons from any bond of error, to create a corner in print where the truth can be had. This is to be no attack, no defense; it is neither to blame nor to praise. "Sir Oliver," quoth Sir Peter Teazle, "we live in a damned wicked world and the fewer we praise the better." No, there's to be neither love nor hate, nor praise, nor censure, nor bouquets, nor brickbats, nor interest, personal or political. Truth shall be the watchword, first as last. For all that, it will strike the generous mind that in the matter of family I have done enough. Campbell in his "Lives of the Lord Chancelors" deals out the genealogy of his woolsack heroes with no such liberality as I have shown. Even in the instance of the bloody, and therefore interesting Jeffries, about all that Campbell tells us is that Jeffries' father was a Welshman, who took occasion to prophesy a headless ending for his son by block and axe on Tower Hill. "parentage" of his noble hero in twenty-five pages. And as Sir Walter was father of Lockhart's wife, the author was bound to warm to his subject, and hold for it a filial love by sheer artifice of law. (Page 9).

One is not, however, to blame Walton, nor Campbell, nor Lockhart, nor those others of our biographers who expand not themselves generously in affairs of pedigree. It's not so much neglect as caution. And to you who read, and who, at this time, for aught one knows, may be sowing the seeds of the pedigree habit within your own breast, a word of warning should be flung. . . . Have a care as you climb the family tree, lest your sensibilities should heir a fall. One must not crowd one's ancestry to the wall, nor harass it with too strict a search, lest it turn and rend one. It has been the fault of every age that more folk were hanged than crowned. . . . There lives none but who is bound, by the very argument of opportunity, and as one thousand is to one, to face the risk of an ancestry, which, with the last word, will climb a gallows rather than a throne. Or why should some genius of ear, or eye, or hand of nerve-fineness, look over the poor fist-genius who is born to batter those features of mouth and nose and ears and eyes which a Lely is born to paint, a Phidias to carve, a Handel to compose a hymn for, and for which a Wren or an Angelo is to build a church? Carmel's Dramatic Venture

The ambitious project of a forest theater with amateur players will be inaugurated tonight at Carmel-by-the-Sea. Readers will recall that Michael Williams described the principles and purpose of this venture in a recent communication to Town Talk. From Grace MacGowan Cooke I have just received a letter with details of the production which will be the maiden effort of the Carmelites. Mrs. Cooke is the press agent of the theater and her work is very interesting. Interesting too is a photograph which she encloses. It represents my old friend Professor George H. Boke, the Berkeley pundit, in the garb of the prophet Samuel, the part which he will adorn this evening. Boke is a very impressive looking Samuel. Part of his flowing drapery is folded over his head concealing the bald spot of that dome of fevered thought while a white beard disguises the lower part of his interesting countenance. His right arm is extended dramatically in a gesture which leads me to infer that he is pointing with pride to something, but whether it be to David, the shepherd king, to the Witch of Endor or to Hiram Johnson I am at a loss to say. If I find time to run down to Carmel to see the first production at the Forest Theater it will give me excessive pleasure to watch Boke in the unfamiliar role of a mummer. At the same time it strikes me that recent events in San Francisco must have filled Boke with feelings more allied to the character of Jeremias than to that of Samuel.

The Play is "David"

Seriously however I am greatly interested in the information which Carmel's feminine press agent has sent me. Feminine press agents are apt to avoid the ruts in which their masculine co-workers usually plod along. I recall in this connection the good work done by the very charming young lady who did the press work for Miss Florence Roberts during her last visit to this city. I learn from Mrs. Cooke that the drama of "David" is from the pen of Constance Skinner of whom I have heard ere now and that it will be produced under the direction of Garnet Holme whose name is new to me. Miss Skinner's drama deals with Saul's hatred of the newly-anointed shepherd and of the love of David for Michal, Saul's young daughter. That Mrs. Cooke is no ordinary press agent may be guessed from this specimen of her colorful language: "Like a rare, pure flower on a background of crimson, this tender story of young love shines out against the bloody, brutal tragedy of the day and time." With Mrs. Cooke's statement that in those wondrous days "the power of beauty was dimly felt" I cannot agree however. "Dimly" is not the word. A reader of the Bible must be impressed with the tremendous influence exerted by beauty. In the cast of characters I recognize the names of Herbert Heron, dear Professor Boke, Helen Cooke, the daughter of the press agent, Alice MacGowan and Bertha Newberry. The others are strange to me. Well, here's good luck to Carmel's first dramatic attempt.

A Trip in a Torpedo Boat

I met Walter Doyle, the able police reporter of the Call, the other day and without holding me with his glittering eye—because his eye doesn't glitter—he told me a yarn of the sea that interested me a great deal more than the tale of the Ancient Mariner interested the fidgety Wedding Guest. Doyle was the guest of Lieutenant Ross S. Culp, U. S. N., on a recent trip which the torpedo boat Goldsborough made from this port to San Diego. The torpedo boat Rowan went along in charge of Lieutenant S. H. Lawton. Doyle is a bit of a sea dog himself and he told me that he had never seen such rough weather in his life. The story is interesting as showing the bravery and efficiency which the officers and men of the navy display in the routine of duty and I will let Doyle tell it in his own words. "We weighed anchor," Doyle told me, "in the morning and just as we were getting out of the Golden Gate we commenced to get a very choppy sea and a stiff breeze. We were steaming up to 150 revolutions or about twelve and a half knots. We passed a French brig and noting that her canvas was pretty well torn, prepared for a storm. As we rounded out into the ocean we struck a big swell and the wind increased. As we struck our course the sea came astern much faster than we were traveling. The Goldsborough began to pitch and roll and we could see that the Rowan was making very heavy way of it. We could only see her for a minute or so at a time."

An Ominous Message

"About five-thirty in the evening," continued Doyle, "we hit the real thing. We noted a distress signal from the staff of the Rowan. We slackened to about five knots—just enough to let the helmsman keep our boat up—and as the Rowan rolled on the crest of the wave we got this message, one of the worst you can get at sea: 'Tube burst, number two boiler. Stand by.' We signaled to find out if anybody had been injured and after terrible suspense got the answer, 'None.' So perfect is the discipline on these boats that the men without needing orders had leaped below for bandages, picric acid, etc., while others stood by the davits of the whale boat, ready to lower away. The Rowan had stopped and the wind and the sea were driving her. Soon she signaled that she would get under way, half speed, in ten minutes; then that she would make standard in fifteen minutes. That was pretty fine work, considering her accident. The wind increased to a gale and the waves rolled over us, burying the bow in green sea. We shipped green sea over the jack staff and took spray on the bridge. This was at sundown. All through the night we battled one sea after another. Our deck was awash and it was next to impossible to make one's way from the bridge aft. The men clung for their lives to the life lines as they went to their stations. Extra lookouts were placed on the aft conning tower to report the Rowan's signals. Along about ten at night, off Point Concepcion, the sea seemed to be at the height of its fury."

The Height of the Storm

"We were rolling," Doyle went on, "nearly a quarter of the circle's degrees and taking water into the cabin and the crew's quarters. The glass port holes broke under the strain of the water. At half-past ten the quartermaster reported a signal from the Rowan. It took four men and two officers fully eighteen minutes to get the signal, so great was the storm. It was: 'Life boat carried away.' They were surely having a lively time of it, as I learned afterwards. Lawton was below, trying to get a little rest after twelve hours on the bridge and Ensign Leo Welch was on the job. When the Rowan took the sea astern she keeled to starboard and dipped her high bow well into the sea. Quivering from stem to stern, her propeller blades racing above water, she keeled again, this time to fully ninety degrees. The life boat, lashed high to the davit arms, went deep into green sea and filled with water. It seemed to Welch and his men that the Rowan could never right herself. They were hurled from their feet. The helmsman almost lost his grip on the helm but responded cheerily to Welch's cry of 'Catch her!' For three or four minutes they fought a terrific battle to right her and get her in her course. The davit irons snapped like pipe stems and the life boat was torn away. A gunner's mate battening a hatch over the officers' cabin was struck by a heavy sea and hurled through the steel life lines with such force that he was dazed. Three men standing amidships saw the sea taking their comrade and rushing over managed by mighty exertions to pull him back on deck. The storm continued for twenty-one hours, a wonderful battle of young naval officers and their brave men against the most tremendous powers of nature. But they won out handily. No wonder, though, that Commodore L. C. Richardson complimented Culp and Lawton when it was all over." And I echoed, "No wonder!"

Automobile Extravagance

Several times in these columns I have called attention to the extraordinary number of automobiles in this city and have pointed a moral of extravagance therefrom. Figures at my elbow show me that casual observation has not played me false. From the first of January to the first of June this year 6,877 automobiles were licensed at the office of the Secretary of State. Naturally the greater number of these machines must be owned near San Francisco. I find also that 35,513 automobiles have been licensed since the licensing statute went into effect and that this represents an expenditure of about $35,000,000. All of this money has not been expended for mere pleasure; the automobile is a valuable accessory of business. But when we reflect on the comparative scarcity of business automobiles and the superabundance of joy wagons, it must be admitted that there are a parlous number of millions invested in an expensive luxury. The financial letter of the American National Bank from which I have obtained my figures makes this reasonable comment: "While in many—perhaps most—instances the indulgence is reasonably commensurate with the means available for its gratification, there is undeniably a growing tendency on the part of many who cannot afford it to mortgage their future earnings for the same purpose. And this tendency it should be the duty of bankers to discourage."

A Sensation the Papers Missed

I am amazed that none of the papers took the trouble to ascertain the names of the women who occupied the very exclusive box on the rim of the Reno arena during the prizefight. Perched in their eyrie against the sky these women were the cynosure of all eyes, but apparently none of the newspapermen were curious to learn who they were. That mystifying indifference lost them the best story that could have been published in connection with the fight. The women in that box were nearly all very fair to look upon, they were all stylishly and attractively gowned and they manifested the most eager interest in the pugilistic encounter. These facts alone made them the sort of newspaper material which our sensational editors love to use, but there were other reasons why they should have been exploited prominently. The fact of the matter is that two of those women belonged to the inner circle of our Four Hundred. No big affair in this city or in Burlingame is considered successful unless they lend the prestige of their presence to it. Whenever they appear in public the bavardes tell about it in the society columns. Their names are known to the countless thousands in town who read society news. How in the name of all that is strange and unaccountable did the papers miss chronicling their presence at the prizefight? In addition to these two women there were in the box several of the best known members of the divorce colony of Reno. The marital difficulties of these latter have been exploited all over the United States and their faces should be easily recognized by a wide awake newspaperman. Evidently the reporters were all too busy watching the fight to pay any attention to them. Even the two women who attended the fight for two local papers failed to identify any of these well known women. What are our papers coming to?

Fair Fight Fans at the St. Francis

A picnic suddenly transformed to a funeral could not have been more hushed and solemn than was the crowd of women that filled the tapestry and tea rooms of the Hotel St. Francis on Monday afternoon, the day of the fight. Every word from the ringside was listened to with quiet alert attention and when the first round of extras came in, the women bought them with frantic eagerness. The story was read out loud here and there, the women crowding about the reader for all the world as if the news were of vital importance. "Good gracious, and my husband left so confident and happy yesterday." "Well, it has taught me a lesson. Men are not infallible in their judgment." "My, what a narrow escape I've had. I wanted to bet a couple of hundred but mamma wouldn't let me. I'm glad that I listened to her." "Well, there goes the automobile that I was promised. Guess we'll have to walk or go by trolley." These were some of the comments heard in the tea room where the womenfolk whose husbands and brothers were at Reno, comforted themselves with tea and ice cream, condoling with each other on the disappointment of the day. Such chagrin and sorrow overwhelmed them that all the laments were those of pity rather than censure for the mistaken judgment of the men who had predicted otherwise. For some reason, difficult to understand, the women were far more intensely and genuinely interested in the contest than in any previous affair of this kind.

The Nodding Bavardes

The city is a veritable Sleepy Hollow. Everybody who is anybody is out of town and those who are forced to stay behind have their front blinds discreetly pulled down and are living stealthily in the back of their homes. They don't want to be found in town! The bavardes are hard put to it to find social items during this dreary out-of-season period. Their dire straits, however, are no excuse for the many glaring mistakes which are appearing daily in their columns. Why, for instance, in their accounts of the wedding of pretty Elaine Brashear and Coleridge Ertz should they refer to Mrs. Safford Colby, the charming matron of honor, as "the sister of the bride"? As a matter of fact there is absolutely no relationship. Mrs. Colby was a New York girl when she married Safford Colby, the son of Paymaster Colby, U. S. N., several years ago. While visiting in Blithedale Miss Brashear and Mrs. Colby met and became dear friends. Again I read in one of the veracious dailies that Mrs. Florence Pope Frank had rented her house for the summer and would spend the season abroad. The sorrowful truth is that Mrs. Frank died a couple of years ago of malignant cancer. I learned with considerable surprise that Mr. and Mrs. William Gwin had returned from a lengthy visit in the East to their son William and were accompanied by their sons Ralph and Stanford. I happen to know that William Gwin Jr. has been in Paris for the last two years cultivating his voice which by the way is one of great promise while Ralph Gwin has been dead these many years. Again one paper informs us that Mr. and Mrs. Pool will spend some time at Tahoe with Mr. and Mrs. Harry Babcock. This is only partially true. Mrs. Pool, the sister of Mrs. Babcock, will visit Tahoe but her husband Lawrence Pool, the well known Pacific-Union clubman, died many years ago. Truly the bavardes must be awfully hard up for news when they insist on resurrecting the dead.

A Laughable Instance

One of the most amusing mistakes of this sort was made by the Call of last Friday. On the first page in the position of greatest importance appeared a picture of Miss Jennie Lee. The portrait must have been about fifteen inches long and five inches wide. Accompanying this was a meager item announcing the engagement of this very charming young lady to Ensign Albert Reis. Now Miss Lee is one of our most beautiful and most interesting young women and is the object of a great deal of admiration on the part of eligible society chaps. But by all newspaper standards her engagement was not of sufficient importance to warrant such an unusual half-tone display. When Princess Alice announced her engagement to Nick Longworth she was not honored with quite so great a pictorial compliment in any of our papers. And the funny part of the incident was that the announcement was a mistake which was duly corrected next day in a very tiny item in the society column. I am inclined to think that there may be some truth in the bare statement that Miss Lee is engaged, though not to Ensign Reis. Gossip links her name to somebody else but I am not at liberty to divulge the name.

The Groom Belied His Name

The development and training of a sense of humor ought to be included in the curriculum of every college and university. A man might easily make his mark in the world without knowing anything about logarithms or biology but he is destined to many a bitter drubbing if his fun instinct is latent. Several hundred summer idlers at Yosemite Park, in the vicinity of Camp Curry, impressed this fact on young Frank Gay of Redlands who was Stanford's quarterback two seasons ago. Gay is a solemn young giant, in fact almost as somber as the plumes on a hearse and his excess of dignity aroused the prankish instincts of a crowd of picnickers. He was married to a charming young woman from Redlands a few weeks ago and had taken his bride to the Park. One evening a few days ago a number of youthful campers thought it would be a nice little compliment to serenade the bride and groom at their tent. Fifty or more of them circled about the tent singing joyful songs. Gay, however, did not look upon the attention in the nature of a compliment. After standing their lusty mirth as long as he could, he suddenly hurled his six foot four of husky strength out of the tent and made a lunge for the nearest singer. The crowd tore them apart, changing the tune to "For he's a jolly good fellow," all the time whirling about the tent like a lot of wild dervishes. Gay again made an attack and in less than a minute there was a general fight, with Gay striking out to the right and to the left with the speed of a prizefighter. The bride looked on for a while, then broke down and sobbed. One of the older women stepped in to call a halt and rebuked the furious groom for his woodeny lack of humor. Everybody ceased singing and the young couple were left alone. Early in the gray dawn of the following morning they made their departure, walking from the camp before anyone was up.

A Book for Snobs

C. W. de Lyon Nicholls of New York is about to publish a new edition of his book "The Ultra Fashionable Peerage of America." He says that he has revised his old list and that of the names in the new list not more than ninety-nine will represent families that reside outside of New York. Apropos of this great piece of news the Call tells us that "every one is wondering who from San Francisco will rank in the holy of holies"; also, that the news of the coming volume "has set the fashionables of Chicago, Philadelphia, Boston, etc., on the qui vive as to who will be in the social ranks of the union." All of which excites in me a touch of incredulity. I haven't heard anybody discuss the coming volume. I asked Willie O'Connor what he thought about it and he asked "who in h—— is de Lyon Nicholls." I told him that Mr. Nicholls was a descendant of Robert Bruce, and he told me that the Caledonian Club was full of Bruce's descendants some of whom were working in the Park for McLaren. I consulted another scion of one of our first families, and he told me that the only member of our smart set who could give me any reliable information about current literature was Mrs. Frank Carolan. He also said that if Mr. Nicholls was capable of making a genuine contribution to literature Mrs. Carolan would know all about him. I explained that what I wanted to know was whether any member of our provincial aristocracy would be disappointed if omitted from the revised list of the American peerage, whereupon he informed me that he wasn't acquainted with some of the latest arrivals from the bottom of the ladder. He did not mind venturing the opinion however that the new book would fail to create a sensation either at Burlingame or Hillsboro.

Back from the Desert

Mrs. Hugo Mansfeldt who recently returned from Africa where she spent nearly a year among the wanderers of the desert, the mistress of her own caravan, is now at her country home near Napa. During her sojourn on the desert Mrs. Mansfeldt was in every sense of the term a stranger in a strange land among a strange people, for she passed months without seeing one of her own race. The experience she says was most fascinating; and the Arabs she found a most interesting and hospitable people. She became an enthusiastic student of their manners, customs and language, and their literature is now her hobby.

A Bride from Washington

One of the most recent and prominent of Washington brides, Mrs. A. Robert Elmore, has arrived in Los Angeles with her husband and is being much feted of late. Mrs. Elmore is the daughter of Senator and Mrs. Sutherland of Washington, D. C. As Miss Edith Lee Sutherland, Mrs. Elmore was one of the most popular of late capital debutantes and the wedding was attended with much pomp and ceremony, while it was honored by the presence of many Washington and Atlantic coast notables. Mr. Elmore found an attractive business opening in Los Angeles shortly before his marriage and returns to continue in his old position. He is something of an ornament to society himself and lent his talent and support to the success of the spring Kirmess. It was during the round of private entertainments attendant upon the preparation for the Kirmess that news of the approaching nuptials leaked out.

The Singleton Difficulty

The John Singletons of Los Angeles, after eight years of troubled married life, appear to find it not so very easy to separate after all and friends of the couple would not be at all surprised to learn that further proceedings had been indefinitely postponed. Numerous details have occupied the attention of the attorneys for both parties to the recently filed suit and Mrs. Singleton left recently for New York, resigning herself to a further delay of the hearing until fall at least. Her younger sister, Miss Lillian Graham, has just returned from Europe and Mrs. Singleton went on to meet her in the metropolis with a view to assisting her as far as possible toward securing a desirable position in an operatic or dramatic company, in both of which branches of professional entertainment she has had some experience.

From London, in the letter of a correspondent, there comes to me news of a wedding innovation which is likely to become popular in these United States. It is the substitution of a best girl for a bevy of bridesmaids. This novelty has already been seen at several fashionable weddings in London and is regarded with favor by the English, despite their usual conservatism where old customs are concerned. The best girl does not follow the bride up the aisle, as the bridesmaids do, but stands at the head of the center aisle opposite the position of the best man. There both await the arrival of the bride and bridegroom. With the best man the best girl follows the pair down the aisle after the ceremony. It seems to me that this is an innovation which will be eagerly acclaimed by prospective brides, although the girls who are constantly in demand as bridesmaids will regard it with dismay—until their own time comes to figure as the principal performer in a wedding ceremony. As an economical reform it is not open to question. To buy a present for a best girl instead of for a bevy of bridesmaids means the saving of a pretty sum. Who will be the first bride to have a best girl at her wedding?

Luncheon at the Palace

The luncheon hour at the Palace is one of the jolly periods of the day and supplies one of the most interesting scenes to be found about the hotels of the city. The orchestra is discoursing classical and popular music, the white and gold decorations of the long dining rooms give the requisite touch of beauty, there are quantities of flowers in brilliant hues; while the guests who gather about the splendidly appointed tables complete the picture. The Palace guests are a study in themselves for they come from the four points of the compass. There are people of gigantic business interests both at home and abroad, globe trotters, princes of the Orient, princes and noblemen of Europe with their ladies, army officers and their wives and daughters, debutantes and their mothers and belles of the ball room wearing clothes that would be the envy of Paris. All meet in the spacious dining rooms, enjoying their luncheon and many times not knowing the station and financial standing of some of the noted persons of the world who are quietly discussing the menu at adjoining tables.

In the Social Spotlight

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Franklin Fletter (Leola Spofford Stone), have returned from their honeymoon spent at the Rose Carnival at Portland and Lake Tahoe and will be in town until August when they will make an eastern tour.

Mrs. George Kerr entertained a party of friends very pleasantly at tea in the St. Francis last Saturday, following an enjoyable afternoon at the Columbia. Mrs. Kerr arranged the affair in compliment to Mrs. Harold Havens and Mrs. King.

Mrs. John W. Toule with Miss Marion and Noama Toule of Omaha, are paying a few weeks' visit to Santa Clara Valley.

Recent arrivals at the Hotel Victoria include Mrs. Hamilton Beall, Los Gatos; Dr. and Mrs. Lester Curtis, Chicago; C. B. Collins, Toledo; A. E. Laud, Toledo, and Y. W. Yeatmas, Cincinnati.

W. R. Sherwood went down from San Francisco to visit Mrs. Robt. Sherwood at the Vendome recently.

Recent San Francisco arrivals at Hotel del Coronado included Miss L. M. McDonnell, Mr. and Mrs. Herman Cohn, Julian D. Cohn, Milton H. Cohn, Mr. and Mrs. S. Abraham, H. R. The flower show will be a fashionable event of the fall season and many of the most prominent women of the city and the peninsula will exhibit this year. An effort will be made to make the flower exhibit a smart as well as a beautiful event, as it is in Paris where the finest flower shows of the world are held, although California truly boasts the possession of the finest flowers. The flower show will take place at the Fairmont Hotel, October 20 to 22, inclusive.

Sir Robert Hadfield and Lady "Bob" have started on a motor trip through California. They made their start from the Palace Hotel where they have made their home while in San Francisco and expect to cover the entire State, stopping at the principal points of interest.

An important party that will be at the Potter in July is that of Emory Wingate of New York. He will be accompanied by Mrs. Wingate, his two children, and Mrs. Morris Casey of San Francisco. Their visit will last two months.

As usual regular musicians have been engaged to play in the Potter Hotel during the summer. Miss Lydia Berth, the talented violinist of Los Angeles, has been engaged with her assistants, Rolla E. Gardiner, 'cellist, and Albert Bode, pianist. Beside the regular orchestra work, Miss Berth is planning to give a series of chamber music concerts. The concerts will include standard trios and solos and will be very interesting to the hotel guests and their friends.

Mrs. Fulton G. Berry, widow of the late Commander Berry, her daughter, Miss Maude Lillian Berry, and Miss Emily Gardner, have taken permanent apartments at the Palace. Since her arrival in town a month or two ago Mrs. Berry has been visiting at the homes of different friends in the service set.

Rear-Admiral Richardson Clover, U. S. N., retired, has been at the Palace, awaiting the arrival of his wife and family from the East.

Following is a list of recent arrivals from San Francisco at Castle Crags: Mr. and Mrs. E. G. Gault, Miss Jemima Ryle, Anna Nicolson, Elizabeth Keyser, Frances Keyser, Mrs. Elsie Grover, Martha A. Ijams, Mrs. Geo. E. Dow, Miss Throck Morton, Mrs. G. J. Bucknall, Marie Mariott, Mr. and Mrs. Clinton Jones, Dr. and Mrs. R. L. Rigdon, Mrs. A. Welch, Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Lent and two children, Miss Marie P. Russell, Mrs. W. R. Chadbourne, Virginia Chadbourne, Anita Chadbourne, Suzette Chadbourn, Nelley Burns, Mr. and Mrs. Jno. McGan and three children and Lee Burke.

Mrs. A. J. Hammond of Hollywood, Los Angeles, with Mr. and Mrs. John M. Brooks, Mrs. C. B. Hass of Birmingham, Alabama, were one of the many motor parties registered at Del Monte recently.

Mrs. G. B. Castle, wife of one of the wealthy sugar planters of Honolulu, spent several days recently at Del Monte with her friend Mrs. M. E. Tenney.

The following are some of the guests who have been at the Potter lately: Mr. and Mrs. E. B. Powers, A. F. Frey, E. S. Levins, H. J. Hart, H. G. Stanton, Mr. C. O. Cohen and family, Miss Playes, R. B. Knox, E. M. Jude, Mr. and Mrs. M. Rosenthal, M. B. Rosenbefg, A. M. Ellis, Los Angeles; Mr. and Mrs. F. L. Roedlig, Pasadena; J. N. Powell, A. C. Brode, Mr. and Mrs. C. A. W. Milligan, Los Angeles; F. O. Dunham, Ocean Park.

The California Conservatory of Music, 147 Presidio avenue, has issued its list of free and partial scholarships to be awarded to talented and deserving pupils. The awards will be made by a committee made up of Georg Kruger, director; Miss Pinkham, principal of Irving Institute, and George Walcker, head of the voice department of the Conservatory.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Baldwin, (Ella Hobart) were delightfully entertained by their numerous friends during their short visit at the Fairmont and left the latter part of the week for their home in Colorado Springs. One of the most elaborate affairs given in their honor was the dinner party at which William B. Bourn was host. It took place at the Fairmont and was attended by five guests. Although so small a function it was one of the best appointed and most elaborate dinners given since the winter season. Mr. and Mrs. Baldwin in turn entertained with several informal luncheons and dinners at the Fairmont during their stay in town.

One of the beautiful affairs of last week was the dinner party given by Mr. and Mrs. John B. Coryell of Menlo Park in the white and gold dining room of the Palace Hotel. The table was massed with lilies-of-the-valley. The center piece was a globe of the lilies at the top of which were mingled a few gorgeous orchids, producing a most beautiful effect. There were eight guests. Mrs. Coryell, as usual, was beautifully costumed, her gown being a combination of orchid tints and white trimmed in exquisite thread lace. The Coryells are leaving soon for Europe and the contemplated voyage was suggested in the ices and creams, the bon bons and cakes served which were all cut in the form of trains, boats, automobiles and tiny suit cases. Hoffman's orchestra rendered a special musical program for the occasion.

Mrs. Fisk in "Becky Sharp"

By Edward F. O'Day

It is to be hoped that Gertrude Atherton will speedily provide Mrs. Fiske with a good play. It has long ceased to be a secret that yielding to Mrs. Fiske's importunities Mrs. Atherton has plunged into the unfamiliar task of dramaturgy. All lovers of the theater will unite in a fervent prayer that her maiden play will be worthy of the great actress for whom it is being constructed. Mrs. Fiske, I take it, is sadly in need of an adequate vehicle for her capabilities. If not, why did she revive "Becky Sharp"?Not that it was to be expected that Langdon Mitchell's episodic play would be so soon consigned to the shelf. It was bound to be revived from time to time by stock companies. The perennial popularity of "Vanity Fair" would insure it a cordial welcome from that very large class of theatergoers which delights in seeing its favorite fictional characters depicted on the stage. But it seems to me that Mrs. Fiske has outgrown the part of Becky in more senses than one. The interest of the play centers in the scene in the third act wherein Rawdon Crawley discovers his wife's infidelity and punches Lord Steyne. Everyone who knows his Thackeray is curious to see how that scene looks on the stage. It looks mighty well with Mrs. Fiske playing Becky, but it is only one of five scenes and the other four are not of sufficient importance to warrant Mrs. Fiske in continuing to present them. It is not very polite to refer to any woman's age, even if she be an actress who is expected to submit to a certain amount of very personal criticism; but in considering Mrs. Fiske in "Becky Sharp" the question of age must be touched on. Mrs. Fiske is not a young woman and more than that, she has not preserved the figure of a young woman. The Becky Sharp of the mind's eye was a slender creature, lithe and supple as a serpent. Mrs. Fiske gives us a Becky who is not this Becky of the mind's eye because she is not a Becky with a well defined waist line. Of course the hideous costumes which fashion condemned women to in the fourth George's time have much to do with the matter. I recall that in the modern garb of a Leah Kleschna Mrs. Fiske was not open to this criticism; the same was true of the part she played in "The New York Idea." Criticism, perhaps, should be able to overlook such a detail. In that case it would be able to offer nothing but praise for Mrs. Fiske's Becky. Mrs. Fiske is an actress distinguished for her great intellectual ability and for her magnetic personality. She easily indicates to her audience the principal notes of Becky's character, her cunning, her calculating selfishness, her satirical humor, her powers of fascination. There are several monologues in the play to which Mrs. Fiske has no difficulty in imparting the semblance of dramatic power, although in the hands of a less capable actress they would be dull and tiresome. I do not say anything about the stock objection to Mrs. Fiske's delivery because I have never experienced that difficulty in hearing and understanding her words which so many complain about. There is no doubt that her staccato utterance is a mannerism but to me it has always seemed a mannerism which conformed perfectly to her mimetic character without detracting from her charm. Mannerisms are as much a part of character in life as they are on the stage. What would Becky Sharp be without her mannerisms? It seems extremely likely to me that Mrs. Fiske's fondness for this part springs as much from her appreciation of Becky's mannerisms as from her desire to exercise her fine mind on a character of the complexity which Thackeray gave to his favorite heroine. There can be no doubt that equally to the mind and to the ear she interprets it with never-failing understanding. That she does not interpret it to the eye with equal felicity I have already noted and this is sufficient reason why she should cease presenting it. Let Mrs. Fiske admit that she has outgrown Becky as prepared for her by Mitchell. And let her turn her attention to some really great play. There are so few actresses of Mrs. Fiske's powers that we have the right to protest when they waste their time. I think she is wasting her time on Becky. Decidedly she is not wasting it on Ibsen, but perhaps Mrs. Fiske objects to Ibsen as a steady diet. In that event she must look elsewhere for a great play. Will Mrs. Atherton please favor us with one? I am on tiptoe with expectation.

It is said that Frederic Thompson's production of the latest dramatic sensation "The Spendthrift" has attracted more attention than any play recently staged in New York. It deals with the timely subject of domestic extravagance and the high cost of living. The play ran nearly all winter in New York. The company will come direct from Atlantic City to San Francisco.

Henry W. Savage's production of the notable European and American success "Madam X" is to be seen at the Columbia in the fall.

Rose Stahl will make a cross country tour with her great success "The Chorus Lady" prior to her New York appearance in a new play now being prepared for her.

Hackett in "Samson"

Pursuing their policy of keeping the Alcazar open all summer with a "two-dollar" star heading the players, Belasco & Mayer announce that James K. Hackett, the famous romantic actor, will commence a six weeks' engagement next Monday evening in Henri Bernstein's much-discussed drama "Samson." As it will be the play's first presentation in San Francisco, and as Mr. Hackett has not appeared here within the last dozen years, the event is of twofold importance. Supporting Hackett will be Miss Beatrice Beckley, a clever young English actress who was his leading woman last season in New York, and Arthur Hoops, a talented player of "heavy" roles who has been with him several years. The regular Alcazar players will round out the casts. "Samson" made a tremendous impression when Mr.

EUGENIO BATTAIN

Tenor, as Canio in "I'Pagliacci" with Bevani Grand Opera Co. coming to Idora Park on July 17th.

Hackett presented it on Broadway, the critics unanimously pronouncing it even a greater play than "The Thief," by the same author. In construction it is almost flawless, its theme being big and modern, its action swift, its climaxes logical and strong, its characters clearly and vividly drawn and its dialogue crisp and rapid. It is a play that grips the heart and the imagination, so masterly is it in conception, so full of splendid vitality.

Fanny Rice at the Orpheum

Marion Murray, one of the popular Murray Sisters who is this season touring with her own company, will appear in a comedy sketch by Edgar Allen Woolf called "The Prima Donna's Honeymoon" at the Orpheum next week. Jolly Fanny Rice will present her original conception of "The Miniature Mimic Stage" which is a delight to both adults and juveniles. In her cabinet which is a reminder of the good old "Punch and Judy," she presents her characters, all of whom are entertaining and amusing. Miss Rice needs no introduction to San Francisco for she is remembered as one of the most successful stars that have ever appeared here. Aubrey Pringle and George Whiting who have for many years distinguished themselves separately in vaudeville have now combined forces and are meeting with immense success. They will amuse in a skit called "Breaking Into Vaudeville." It is an unconventional assortment of comedy and popular songs introduced in a very attractive manner. Signor Travato styled "The Eccentric Violinist" will give us a taste of his skill. Next week will be the last of Will M. Cressy and Blanche Dayne who will appear in another of Mr. Cressy's sketches entitled "One Night Only"; also of Loie Fuller's "Ballet of Light," Captain Maximilion Gruber and Miss Adelina's Equestrian Review and Miss Lily Lena, the English singer.

Mrs. Fiske's Last Week

During her second and final week at the Columbia Mrs. Fiske will present "Pillars of Society" on Monday and Saturday nights and at the matinee on Wednesday. The Ibsen play is expected to draw big houses. It is said to be an exceptionally fine performance. "Becky Sharp" will be offered on Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday nights and at the matinee on Wednesday.

Attractions at Idora

Weber's big military band which began a four weeks' engagement at Idora Park in Oakland last Thursday, has already won the approval of the music lovers of the bay cities. Miss Blanche Mehaffry, the soprano soloist, has a charming voice, sufficiently strong to be adapted to band accompaniment. At every concert she renders a number of popular ballads and operatic selections.

MARION MURRAY

Who will appear in "The Prima Donna's HoneyMoon" this Sunday matinee at the Orpheum

Bevani's big opera company which opens a summer season at the Idora Park Theater on July 17, will arrive from New York tomorrow. Over fifty people are included in the cast and orchestra, a number of the principals being from the Metropolitan and Manhattan companies. The advance sale for the first week begins on Monday at the Oakland store of Sherman, Clay & Co.

Sydney Ayres Returns to Ye Liberty

The Bishop players at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, conclude their special season of musical plays with the performances this Saturday and Sunday of Hoyt's "A Black Sheep," and on Monday evening next resume their regular dramatic season. The opening play will be "Faust" in which Sydney Ayres, the popular leading man of the company makes his reappearance after an absence of six weeks. Manager Bishop is preparing an interesting production of the well known play, for the big revolving stage with which the theater is equipped permits of some spectacular and startling mechanical and electrical effects. All of the favorites of Ye Liberty company will be seen in "Faust" which will have the usual one week's run. "Merely Mary Ann" is announced to follow in which Izetta Jewel opens her special season with the company.

"I pleads guilty ter stealin' dem melons, jedge," said the prisoner, "but I wants de mercy er de court."

"On what grounds?" asked the judge.

"On dese grounds," replied the prisoner; "I stole de melons, but de sheriff didn't give me a chance ter eat 'em!"

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—The sharp break again this week in the stock market can be attributed to the leading banking interests here who have been greatly disturbed over the outlook on the railways, in view of the recent control for rate-making given the Inter-State Commerce Commission; hence leading rails have been sold freely and the market was without any tangible support until the closing days of the week when heavy buying orders appeared in standard securities. There has been some betterment in the crop outlook in the Northwest where some rains have fallen, and this factor has relieved the very pessimistic sentiment prevailing in Wall street in some degree. We hardly expect any great upturn in prices at the moment but a market for stocks that will show slow improvement.

Wheat—Light scattered rains over the Northwest in the first part of the week put a check on the bullish enthusiasm that had been brought about by sensational reports of damage in the Northwest by the long dry period and the high range of temperatures. The market at no time could have been called weak, although there was a reaction of a few cents from the top prices. The extreme bullish talk from the Northwest has been offset to some extent by the more favorable news from the Southwest. The yield and quality of the winter wheat could hardly be better and an early run of new wheat to market is predicted. The few cars of new wheat that have already arrived at Southwestern markets, show exceptional quality, and with present ideal weather conditions for harvesting, it looks as if the Government's estimate is a little too conservative. Of course, the spring wheat crop is now going through its critical period and all news from that quarter has more bearing on the market than anything else. At present, while they have had some rain, it is not sufficient, and a general wetting down of the entire Northwest is urgently needed and unless we get it soon, another howl will come from that territory. The foreign news continues bearish and is of no consequence.

Corn—Corn showed further strength on buying from strictly professional speculative sources. Demand from the latter, however, is widening and has already resulted in considerable tightness in the market. The country has sold corn for future delivery here but the cash sales from the interior continue light. Reports so far are excellent but the speculative trader calls attention to the haw shortage, the general feed shortage in the Northwest and to the probability that the continued dry and hot weather will result in a scare over the holidays or next week.

Cotton—The market has taken an unexpected upward turn lately, due to less favorable weather and crop accounts, which have a tendency to modify previous large crop ideas. There have been heavy rains in the central portions of the belt and in Arkansas and more wet weather in south Atlantic states where it was not wanted, and while there were light scattered showers in west and northwest Texas, there was no rain in Oklahoma, where rain is needed badly. Moreover the indications are for continued wet weather in all sections of the central and eastern portions of the cotton belt where fields are foul already with grass and weeds, as a result of the incessant rains of the month of June prohibiting proper cultivation of the plant. Although showers are promised Texas, there are none such for Oklahoma in sight. The last government crop report was a great disappointment and was a very bullish card. In comparison to last year's report at this time 74.8, against 80.7 of this year, it does not look so bad, but at the best it could only have a passing influence as the weather as a rule has been unfavorable so long. This unlooked for condition being taken into consideration, particularly since the world will require a very large crop next season, the outlook is bound to remain uncertain owing to the spreading of the destructive weevils over the heart of the cotton belt. We therefore can see nothing better for the present than a very conservative position in regard to trading, taking advantage of any dips to buy and selling on any sharp rallies such as we have had in the last few weeks, as the bears can and will work to keep the price of cotton down and in this they are always aided by the disposition of the spinners.

Copper—Copper continues dull, but the decline in prices seems to have halted. Lake is 12 3-4 cents and electrolytic 12 3-8 to 12 5-8 cents a pound. Sales are being made almost every day, but no very large lots have been known to change hands recently. The one bright spot in the situation is the steadily increasing foreign consumption. European consumers who manufacture copper into wire, sheets, various other shapes and compositions and ship it all over the world are evidently finding an increasing demand as the price declines. With the general revival in business throughout Europe has come a resumption of electrical construction and equipment, which is encouraged to some extent by the low price of copper. All of these factors are helping to check the growth of the surplus supply. There is good reason for the belief, however, that consumption in this country, which has grown quite steadily since the 1907 panic, is now beginning to fall off; but notwithstanding this the world's markets are still taking more copper than ever previously. Production continues to increase slightly. While innumerable small mines have reduced their output or discontinued shipping to custom smelters, because of the low price of the metal, the Butte district, Greene Cananea and the big porphyry mines of Utah and Nevada are steadily increasing their outputs. Copper mining securities are so low and profits so small that the development of new properties is being discouraged. Some of the large producers, which are now helping to flood the market with metal, are exhausting their ore reserves very rapidly. Consumption will continue to increase, but there will come a time ultimately when the growth of production will halt or decline and copper will again sell at from 15 to 20 cents.

quez to his associates at the house of Leiva. Several conversations on the subject were had, Mrs. Leiva being present on two occasions. It was also proposed to rob the New Idria stage and a store on the San Benito. Vasquez instructed his subordinates to shoot down every person who should refuse to obey orders. He hoped, however, that there would be no occasion for bloodshed.

The raid on Snyder's was fixed for the 26th of August. Abdon Leiva arranged with one Joaquin Castro to take Rosaria and his two children to San Emedio, Kern County, 160 miles south, and there remain until he and Vasquez should rejoin them. The band left Cantua on the 24th, and was composed of the following persons: Vasquez, Leiva, Chavez, Moreno and Gonzalez. At night the gang reached the house of Manuel Larria, Vasquez's brother-in-law, in the Vallecitos valley. After remaining a short time they went on and camped for the night at Hernandez ranch, near the Panoche. In the morning Leiva and Chavez went ahead, and waited for the others at the Comez ranch. That night the bandits struck the stage road to Hollister. A few miles on, a whiskey saloon was discovered, where Vasquez and Chavez got a bottle of whiskey. At daybreak, on the morning of the 26th, the party came to the Tres Pinos creek. Leaving the road, they took to the fields and went up a small canyon, where they selected a good camping place, and lay concealed from observation until late in the afternoon. The party broke camp at about 5:30 p. m. Vasquez sent Leiva and Gonzalez ahead to ascertain the lay of the land. They were instructed to go to Snyder's store and wait until the others should come up. Arriving at the store the two dismounted, and went inside and called for drinks. They were waited on by John Utzerath, the clerk. A few minutes afterwards the mail arrived, and while Utzerath was sorting it, Moreno came to the door. His face was muffled by a scarf, as at the Twenty-one Mile House. Gonzalez at this time was partially inebriated, and would have become totally unfit for business had not Leiva checked him. The following persons were then in the store: L. C. Smith, blacksmith, Andrew Snyder, proprietor of the store, John Utzerath, his clerk, ——— Murray, and one or two others, names unknown. Before Moreno arrived, Snyder was called outside by one McKune, to whom he paid some money. The transaction was observed by Leiva. Moreno, when he arrived at the door, drew his pistol; Leiva and Gonzales followed suit. The men in the store were ordered to lie down, and all complied. While the three bandits were engaged in tying their victims, Vasquez and Chavez rode up.

Vasquez entered the store just as the last man was being tied. He at once asked, "Are you all through?" Receiving an affirmative answer, he continued, "then one of you come out here." Gonzalez went out. At this time, Vasquez wore a broad-brimmed hat and a large, open-sleeved cloak. At this juncture, a Portuguese sheep-herder, named Bernard Bihury, came up to the door. Not knowing the character of the new-comers, he attempted to enter the store, when he was ordered to halt and lie down, by Gonzalez. The Portuguese, who did not understand English, paid no attention to the order, but when he saw Gonzalez' pistol pointed in the direction of his head, he started to run to the rear of the store. Gonzalez followed. Bihury made a circuit and struck a bee line for the fence, in order to gain the Hollister road, on the north side of the store. Just as he was in the act of climbing, his pursuer fired, the bullet striking him in the cheek. He cleared the fence, but as soon as he reached the ground, Moreno, who stood by the door, sent a bullet crashing through his brain and the unfortunate man fell dead on the porch, within a few feet of his murderer. In the meantime, Chavez had been occupied in disposing of a little son of L. C. Smith, in the stable yard. The boy had started to run away when he saw the Mexicans at the store, but Chavez caught up with him and by a blow from his gun, knocked the youngster down; then took him to the store and laid him down with the rest. While Chavez was on his way to Snyder's, a teamster named George Redford, in the employ of Ezra Beach, of Hollister, drove up in front of the hotel with a load of pickets. Dismounting from the wagon-box, he began to attend to the horses, when Vasquez approached with a Henry rifle and ordered him to lie down. Redford, who was troubled with deafness, evidently did not comprehend the order, for he at once started to run in the direction of the stable. He had just reached the stable door when a bullet from Vasquez' rifle passed through his heart, killing him instantly. When found afterwards, he lay face downward, his hands clutching tightly a wisp of hay, and his face horribly distorted from the agonies of the death struggle.

When the bandits came up, Lewis Scherrer, a saddler, was standing in front of the hotel. After a few moments he went to the rear to perform his ablutions. While thus employed, E. S. Burton, brother-in-law of Leander Davidson, the hotel keeper, came in from the stable. The killing of Redford was observed, and then Scherrer made for his shop across the way to defend his own property. He had not proceeded half the distance before Vasquez saw him, and, with rifle in hand, the bandit started to head him off. The saddler saw that he was flanked and he therefore retreated in good order to the kitchen. Vasquez then rushed towards the front and Scherrer hurried through the house in the same direction. The door was open.

Mrs. Davidson, Mr. Davidson and Burton were in the front room. Just at this moment Leiva darted from the store towards the hotel, and shouted to the inmates, "Shut the door, and you won't be hurt; go in, go in!" Davidson was then standing to the right and his wife to the left of the door; Scherrer and Burton were behind them. Leiva had hardly got the words out of his mouth before Vasquez came round the house from the rear, rushed up on the porch, and as Davidson was in the act of closing the door, fired a shot. The bullet passed through the door and pierced Davidson's heart. He fell back into the arms of his wife, and in a few minutes breathed his last. After the shooting, John Haley, a teamster, drove up with a load of grain from Grogan's ranch. Halting in front of the store he looked up, and saw four revolvers and a Henry rifle pointed at his head. "Come down!" was the order given by Vasquez. Haley replied, "What do you want." The answer was a thrust in the ribs from the rifle. He came down and was struck on the head, and then robbed of four dollars and fifty cents.

Meanwhile the men in the store were lying on their backs, alternately guarded by Leiva and Chavez. After Haley had been disposed of, Vasquez went to the store and ordered two of his men to untie Snyder and bring him out, which was done. Vasquez then directed Leiva to take Snyder to his house and obtain what money he had there. Mrs. Snyder appeared at the door, and at her husband's request, and Leiva's promise that no one should be hurt, went inside and returned with a bureau-drawer containing several hundred dollars. The bandits then went into the store, and after relieving the men on the floor of all their valuables, proceeded to appropriate Snyder's provisions, clothing, etc. When they had taken as much as they could carry, eight horses and two saddles were stolen from the stable. The day before, Vasquez had stolen a mule, and this animal was loaded down with provisions, etc. The work of plunder and murder had occupied over three hours. It was now half-past eight o'clock and the word to depart was given, and in a few moments the bandits had passed out of sight of the scene of blood.

The murderers made good their escape to Los Angeles County and there Leiva discovered the criminal intimacy between his wife Rosaria and Vasquez. He tried to kill his leader but was prevented and left, broken-hearted and repentant, to give himself up to justice.

When the tragedy of Tres Pinos became known to the authorities posses were formed to hunt the bandits. It was difficult to enlist men in the enterprise owing to the terror which the name of Vasquez inspired but the sheriffs of Santa Clara and Monterey were soon hot on the trail. The posses came up with Vasquez and Chavez at Rock Creek but the two escaped after an exchange of bullets. Despite his danger Vasquez ventured within the lines of the hunting party to get Rosaria Leiva. She joined him once more—her husband had meanwhile surrendered and for her children she seemed to care nothing—and remained with him in the mountains for several months. But finally Vasquez, fearing that the woman would retard his movements, deserted her in the hills, far from any settlement. The miserable woman was enceinte and her sufferings during the days when she was making her way to the nearest farm were terrible.

Meanwhile a second member of the gang had been captured through the information given by Leiva. This was Moreno who was tried at Salinas for murder and given a life sentence. Vasquez and Chavez fled northward with the sheriffs ever at their heels and in the Cholame Valley Chavez murdered a sheep-herder for $200. His accomplice in this crime was caught and hanged. The two bandits next held up a store at Millertown in Fresno County and then plundered two stores in Kingston. These daring crimes put the State into an uproar and Governor Booth offered a reward of $8,000 for the capture of Vasquez alive and $6,000 for his corpse. The legislature appropriated $15,000 for his capture. Nothing dismayed Vasquez and Chavez continued their depredations, holding up individuals, robbing stages and keeping the country in a state of terror.

The sheriffs of several counties were already in the field when Harry Morse, afterwards the famous detective but at that time sheriff of Alameda, went out with a posse of fifteen picked men in March, 1874.

Morse had not been gone many days before Vasquez and his gang made their appearance at the old Mission, near Los Angeles. Proceeding to the house of Alexander Repetto, they took him out, tied him to a tree and then demanded $800 as a ransome, or they would kill him. Repetto sent a boy to Los Angeles with a check for the amount, but instead of cashing it, the boy went to Sheriff Rowland of Los Angeles and informed him of the outrage, and in a very short time a posse of men was on the road to Repetto's. When they arrived in sight of the house, Vasquez and his companions were in the act of mounting their horses. Rowland gave pursuit. While retreating towards the hills, Vasquez met Charles Miles, John Os-

On the evening of May 14, 1874, a short time after the Repetto affair, information of Vasquez' exact whereabouts was brought to Sheriff Rowland by D. K. Smith. A posse was immediately organized and placed in charge of Under Sheriff Johnson. At ten o'clock the road was taken. Proceeding in the direction of the house of a man known as Greek George, they concealed themselves where they could have a good view of the country, and could not be seen by outsiders. The next morning, a wood wagon was stopped and the driver compelled to turn his horses' heads, allow all the party to lie down in the wagon-bed, and proceed back to the house of Greek George. He was made to understand that if he played them false, his life would pay the forfeit. When the destination was reached, Johnson and his party leaped out, surrounded the house and drew their weapons. Two men were posted at the western side, the others at the southern. The foremost of the party started for the door, when it was suddenly opened by a woman, who gave a quick cry of alarm and attempted to close it. But Johnson's men burst in and saw Vasquez in the act of going through the door leading to the kitchen. One of the men rushed for him, but the bandit made a leap and went through the window. His horse was already saddled and bridled a short distance from the house, but when he landed on the ground he found himself confronted by a band of armed men. Instead of surrendering, he made a dash, when the men fired, wounding him in eight different places. G. A. Beers, special reporter for the San Francisco Chronicle, fired the shot that brought him to terms. Turning around, covered with blood, he threw up his hands and said: "Shoot, you cowards." A moment later and he was in custody. The capture was cleverly planned, and reflected great credit on Johnson and Major H. M. Mitchell. The latter was second in command, and had accompanied Adams, Rowland and Morse in all the expeditions against the bandit in the vicinity of Los Angeles.

The news of the capture of the noted outlaw, who had so long bid defiance to the laws, was received with joy all over the State.

It was thought at first that Vasquez could not possibly survive his injuries, but having a strong constitution, he at length got the best of the Grim Destroyer.

Had it not been for the large reward offered, it is extremely probable that he would now be alive and at large. He was betrayed; "given away" for coin.

Leiva was the principal witness against Vasquez when he was placed on trial at San Jose. The case excited tremendous interest and there was a great array of counsel on both sides. The attorney general, assisted by two Hollister lawyers and the district attorney of Santa Clara conducted the prosecution. Three San Jose lawyers appeared for Vasquez. When the jury brought in its verdict of murder in the first degree and affixed the death penalty women all over the crowded courtroom brought their handkerchiefs into play. The last words which Vasquez spoke in public were: "I am resigned to die, and hope that God may have mercy on my soul."

my head as great as a crown. I cannot tell you what my feelings were on that evening! I looked into Kallif's face: his agate eye was larger, brighter, and more unearthly than ever. All of a sudden I felt ten years older; I knew, without any explanation from Kallif, that he had endowed me for the moment with a power, not for my own use, but for his political ambitions.

"'Ah!' he half groaned, as he gazed at the agate gem in my hair, 'now I shall accomplish something!'

"He turned about and fixed his gaze on a corner of the room where I saw that some drapery partially hid a doorway. There was not a sound to be heard, and Kallif stood motionless, as if awaiting some event. Precsently the curtain moved as by a mysterious breeze, and in walked a man with white hair and beard, wearing several orders set in brilliants. Hardly had he been greeted by Kallif than the visitor turned and tried to fix in his mind the exact place where he had entered the room, just as I myself had done on a dozen different occasions in different rooms in the house.

"I saw by his look that he was baffled. He could not at that moment have found his way out, if he were to win the whole world by succeeding. Kallif knew it, and I knew it, but I pretended not to know. Then a panel, fixed in the centre of one of the walls, glided apart without the slightest noise, and a tall dark man appeared, with a huge military moustache. He, too, after greeting Kallif, glanced with a half-dazed expression towards the spot where he had entered; but I had my eye on that very place, and saw what he did not see: a magnificent fan-shaped screen of peacock and ostrich feathers fold silently together, thus hiding the sliding panel which had let him in. Next to this door was another panel, and had the military man sought an exit by the way he had come, he would have chosen the wrong one.

"I had quite forgotten the presence of the distinguished visitors in the study of doors and mysterious entrances, and my eyes roamed everywhere on the look out for surprises. I was thinking the next visitor would enter somewhere near the same place; I was mistaken. Kallif greeted the third guest—a short, fat man—just behind my seat, but I turned too late to see where he had entered. The fourth guest was ushered in by a Nubian servant through two small folding-doors; as they closed again, curtains glided over them. This guest was the Russian diplomat. There was now a strange trumpet sound in one of the outer rooms, a curtain was drawn aside, and a fakir appeared followed by a hunchback. The fakir looked like a Hindoo; his eyes shone like black beads, his nose was hooked like the beak of a vulture, on his turban was a small ruby serpent, and his costume was covered with various emblems.

"During the evening a screen which stood at one end of the room and a little to one side was removed by a servant without any noise and without a word being spoken, and there stood a table laid with a service of gold, and filled with rare delicacies and wines, many of which were new and strange to me. Eight chairs were placed at the table, three at either side and one at each end. Kallif placed me at one side in the centre seat, and the Russian at my right; the seat at my left he gave to the military-looking man with the fierce moustache. Then with much ceremony, Kallif seated the fakir in the chair directly opposite me. The old gentleman with the white beard was seated on his right, and on his left the short stout man. Kallif gave one of the end seats to the hunchback, and took the other himself.

"We must have been seated at the table about half an hour when a mysterious music began. It seemed far away, beyond any of the rooms near us, floating here and there, now a little nearer, now farther away, then just outside, then overhead, between the ceiling and the roof.

"We had up to this time been served by four black servants, but now, during this music, they slipped away, first one, then another, and were not seen again. The guests helped themselves to the wines which the servants had taken the precaution to place before them. At the sound of the music Kallif's face lit up with an expression of delight, his agate eye rolling in a kind of ecstasy, and I became aware that a secret battle was raging between Kallif on one side and the fakir on the other; now Kallif took from an inner pocket the phial of mysterious elixir and handed it to me behind the chair of the Russian diplomat at my right. As he did so I heard the faint click of the stopper being opened. Instantly an odorous wave enveloped the table, and apparently right under my chair, beneath the floor, the muffled sounds of a tom-tom began a low, measured, sinister beating. Every face at the table was metamorphosed except Kallif's and my own. The beating of the tom-tom grew louder, more ominous and oppressive, and with each rhythmic measure the guests became more and more enthralled in mingled stupor and suspense.

"I looked at the fakir opposite; his gaze was riveted on the agate in my hair. Kallif had placed it just over my forehead, and I knew it was darting its potent gleams straight at the fakir's head.

"All this time I was looking at the fakir, and he at the agate crystal, and I became conscious that he was slowly contracting, withering, like something shrivelling in a dry heat, his head slowly settling down between his square, bony shoulders

His face resembled a great spider with two black eyes peering from a skin of parchment. He was slowly sinking down in his chair. And now I understood the designs of Kallif—I knew the fakir was doomed. The guests looked bewildered, amazed; possibly some of them thought the fakir was only passing through some familiar and oft-repeated feat of the will.

"When I looked at the hunchback at the end of the table, opposite Kallif, I saw that he, too, had settled down in his seat until his head was on a level with the glasses before him. At last the fakir, mumbling something incoherent, let his head fall on the table. At that moment two stalwart Nubians entered. They had come to carry him away, and I knew then that Kallif had taken the place of his formidable rival. Presently they returned and carried off the hunchback. I could see by the expression of Kallif's face that the moment had come to gain the coveted secrets from the Russian diplomat, who now seemed in a half stupor. But suddenly, to my amazement, I saw my aunt's face, white as death, staring straight at me from behind a half-drawn curtain. A sense of imminent danger seized me; she made vehement motions to one side, as if to say: 'Escape! escape!' Up to this moment I had been wondering at all I saw and heard, but now my courage was gone I realized my position. The sudden shock of seeing the blanched face of my aunt had with one stroke brought me back to my normal self; the horror of the situation was thrust upon me. Escape! but how? I felt that I, too, was changing countenance. I was in despair when I thought that Kallif would surely notice my trepidation and hurry on some fatal calamity.

"Five precious minutes passed, and still I sat there unable to move, while Kallif was conversing with the Russian. But now he lifted up his sinister head and surveyed the guests. In another moment he would rise, and with him the half-stupefied company. But imagine my astonishment when, instead of rising, I saw him gradually close his eyes and pass into a state of lethargy, as if dozing in his seat. I felt that my moment had come. My aunt was still watching me, and, swiftly and silently leaving the table, I hurried to her side. I found the woman Minka with her. My aunt took my hand, and, without a word, they hurried me on and on, through the various rooms and turnings, to an exit from the palace, Minka having secured a wrap for me as we passed my apartments.

"Once outside the palace, we all breathed freer; but I felt I should never be safe from the terrible influence of Kallif till I got back to Vienna, in spite of the protection of my aunt. We went to the hotel where she had taken rooms, and, after changing my dress for some of her things, we left that very evening for Vienna, taking Minka with us.

"On the way my aunt told me how, receiving no response to letters sent from Paris to me at Vienna, she grew uneasy, and decided to return to the latter city at once. There she heard of Racham's death and the departure of Kallif and myself for Constantinople. She immediately set out for that city. At Kallif's palace she soon found Minka, and, with her aid, as I have just told you, effected my escape.

"Not long after we were informed that Kallif never recovered from the effects of that terrible evening, having passed away some days later."

"And did either of the twins leave you anything?" asked the little Baroness, her eyes full of wonder.

"When we got back to Vienna, we found that Racham had left me the mansion with everything in it," said the Countess Camille, while she proceeded to make her third cigarette; "and my aunt was not long in beginning a search for the treasure, which, she declared, existed somewhere in the secret vaults of the house. She worked like one possessed. While I held a light, every nook and corner was searched. She had examined four rooms without result, when, just as we were about to leave the fifth, we noticed a peculiar Japanese screen, which seemed to fit in the wall. When this screen was removed, we discovered a small door that led into a narrow space with a heavy iron door at the end. This was opened after a great deal of trouble. We now entered an iron vault, in which stood several large safes. After several days of work and suspense, in which foramilities of the law had to be complied with, my aunt stood in wonder and ecstasy over sack upon sack filled with precious objects. There were collars of diamonds, rubies, sapphires, ropes of pearls, hundreds of rings. She looked like a mad woman as she pulled out the ropes of pearls and strings of precious stones, and threw them in confusion around her neck, one on top of the other. She spent hours opening sacks and counting the coins, until she declared she was so bewildered that she could no longer endure it. As for me, I could not help laughing, she looked so comical.

"Guards were placed at each door until everything was duly counted, registered, and sent to the bank.

"I let my aunt keep all the jewels and the mansion, with everything in it. I kept for myself the fortune in coins and bonds."

"And the mysterious agate?" I asked.

"I must have dropped it in my flight," replied the Countess, with seeming indifference, "for I never saw it again; but a long time afterwards I discovered that I still possessed the precious phial."

"But the secret, the secret of its contents?" chimed in the Baroness, with eager curiosity.

The fact of the Countess Camille assumed a dream-like expression, and for some moments she was lost in reverie. Amidst the noise and confusion of moving trains, she began in that marvelous voice that was hers, and in tones so low that I could just distinguish the words: "I made a most significant discovery"—when the door opened, and in stepped my former chief at the Legation at Constantinople, none of us having noticed the train coming to a dead stop.

My old chief, a man of great dignity and tact, saluted the Countess with marked deference, for he, too, had met her on former occasions. The conversation became formal, and, two hours later, the train having stopped at another junction, there was a general changing of places, we became separated, and during the journey, to my great disappointment, I did not see the Countess Camille again.

Auto Notes

L. F. Spice, an automobile expert of wide experience and reputation, is in San Francisco. Mr. Spice has for some years been prominently connected with the Chalmers factory at Detroit, having had charge of their repair department and supervised the stock rooms. He is making his headquarters with the Pioneer Automobile Company.

One casing giving five years' service and covering 80,000 miles is an almost incredible achievement, but it is an actual record made by a Diamond casing used on R. K. Moore's Rambler touring car. Mr. Moore who lives in Lemoore, writes the local branch of the Diamond Rubber Co. as follows: "I have a 30x3½ regular Diamond casing that I had driven on my model K Rambler touring car for the last five years. I just took the casing off my car, not because it was entirely gone, but I had driven it so far that I thought it surely must have done its work and the safest thing to do was to put on a new casing. This casing ran 80,000 miles if it ran a foot."

W. H. Harvey, a prominent merchant of Shingle Springs, El Dorado County, has just come to San Francisco with a party of friends in his '09 model Oakland "40" touring car. Harvey is an enthusiastic advocate of Oakland endurance and worth. He has during the past year driven his machine over practically all the El Dorado and Placer County roads and reports that he takes the steepest grades in this mountainous section on the intermediate.

Mr. Heidbrink, representing the factories of the J. P. Davies Co., manufacturers of Buckeye Cleanser Automobile Soap, has been in San Francisco recently. Mr. Heidbrink came West by the northern route and spent some time in the Northwest where he reported business in the Buckeye brand booming. He spent a few days with George P. Moore, coast representative of Monogram who also looks after Buckeye interests.

The Baker Electric delivery wagon in use at the White House is giving very satisfactory service. It is used for delivering books from the Congressional Library to the White House and the offices of government officials; also for the various requirements of the executive offices. Its cleanliness, safety and economy of operation is a decided advantage over the horse drawn vehicle formerly used.

Gustav Knecht of the Braun, Knecht and Heimann Co. who recently drove to Los Angeles in a Hupmobile, has just returned home and reports an enjoyable trip. The Hupmobile made the whole distance without the least trouble and proved its ability to hold its own with the best of the big cars with which it fell in on the way down.

Several of the park base-ball teams are playing this year under the colors of various makes of automobiles. Prominent among these is the Hupmobile Junior team which is one of the chief contenders for this season's base-ball honors in park fandom. This team has been winning with astonishing frequency, having annexed fully 75 per cent of the games played. S. G. Chapman declares that they are playing up to Hupmobile standard.

One hundred thousand miles of service or a running distance that would four times encircle the earth and have a little jaunt across the United States in addition is a record that should win any automobile lasting fame. Such is the achievement made by the White Stanhope owned by A. J. Wills of Akron, Ohio. This car has been kept in constant service since it was bought several years ago and when its 100,000 miles were reached it was still running smoothly. Such records as this are fast dispelling the former idea of automobile shortness of life.

J. W. Shannon, a prominent real estate dealer of Oakland, has just returned from a trip made in his model 19 five-passenger Haynes touring car. Mr. Shannon made the tour through San Luis Obispo to Santa Maria via Santa Barbara. From there he went to Bakersfield and thence over the mountains back to Pizmo beach. From this latter town he made two trips to Paso Robles and then came back to San Francisco. The total mileage was 2,500. This Haynes is the first car that Shannon has ever owned and although he has had it only two and a half months he made the entire run without the least trouble. He reports that due to heavy hauling and ruts the roads in the oil districts are exceptionally bad.

R. Tibbitts of the Healy-Tibbitts Construction Company is an enthusiastic booster of Diamond tires. Mr. Tibbitts owns a White car which always wears Diamond and the service given, he declares, is little short of marvelous. The car is put to the hardest sort of running over roads anything but conducive to long tire life. From ten to twelve thousand miles is the average for each Diamond tire used.

Announcement has been made that the Automobile Club of California has appointed Percy J. Walker as chairman of the Race Committee to supervise the Golden Gate Road Race of September 10. This appointment gives general satisfaction on account of Walker's recognized understanding of the auto racing game and his absolute fairness in dealing with all competitors.

R. M. Drake, a prominent Southern Pacific official and civil engineer of this city, has recently taken delivery of a Haynes.

In their recent tests on this coast the United States submarine achieved the remarkable record of 30 hours non-stop. At the completion of this strenuous feat a thorough investigation showed the engines to be still working perfectly. Throughout the run they had kept cool, a feature never before realized in similar tests. Speaking of the performance which sets a new mark in submarine possibilities the authorities in charge declared that everything was dependent on the engines which in turn owed much to lubrication. As a consequence much credit is given to Monogram Oil which by a recent contract is the lubricant specified for all submarine engines in government service.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE WHY ORDER FOR SALE OF REAL ESTATE SHOULD NOT BE MADE

In the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California—No. 7166, Probate, Dept. 10.

In the Matter of the Estate of SARA E. STRATTON, Deceased

John M. Reynolds, Administrator of the estate of SARA E. STRATTON, deceased, having filed his petition herein, duly verified, praying for an order of sale of all the real estate of said decedent for the purposes therein set forth.

It is threfore ordered by said Court, that all persons interested in the estate of said deceased appear before the said Superior Court on Monday, the fifteenth day of August, 1910, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon of said day, at the Courtroom of Department 10, Probate, of the said Superior Court, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, to show cause why an order should not be made authorizing and directing John M. Reynolds, as Administrator of said Estate of SARA E. STRATTON, deceased, to sell all of the real estate of the said deceased, SARA E. STRATTON.

And that a copy of this order be published at least once a week for four consecutive weeks in "Town Talk," a newspaper printed and published in said City and County.

Dated: June 30, 1910. JAS. M. TROUT, Judge.

A Good Story for Boys

A few years ago Everett Tomlinson conceived the idea of selecting four typical American boys representative of the different sections of the country, and sending them, in the summer vacations, on extended trips about their own country with a view to acquainting them and incidentally their readers, with the history, geography and progress of other portions of the United States besides that in which they happened to be domiciled. Accordingly, this quartette paid a visit first to the Yellowstone region by way of the Great Lakes; next they saw something of the South, and then they went into camp near the Mississippi, in Arkansas. Evidently the author has thought again, if not better, of his original project for, some property right in an English coal mine discovered on land which had long ago passed out of the possession of his ancestors, seems likely to make the father of Lee Harris, the Southern lad, a fairly well-to-do man, and Lee, who is to attend to some of the details of the transaction by which the income is to be secured, sets sail for England accompanied by his four chums. Scarcely have they landed when Lee disappears, and the other lads have an opportunity to try their skill at detective work while they see something of the historic monuments of England which each appreciates after his own manner, Larcum Brown, the Chicago youth who has given up school for a clerical position under his father in a railroad office, as usual, standing up stoutly for America first and the west before all the rest, while John Field, the Bostonian, is equally intent on glorifying landmarks, and Scott Gordon, the New Yorker, still feels that he is competent to lead in every emergency. The boys make pleasant friends both during and after the voyage, and it is to be hoped that the readers of the book will make note of the difference in attitude between their own assertiveness and the polite if slightly incredulous English youths. There is the usual tendency to make bad puns and tell old stories but one must bear in mind the fact that boys of a certain age are prone to these indulgences and as for the most part the conversations take place amongst themselves, no one else suffers. Whatever may be the verdict of the grown ups, Mr. Tomlinson has scored with his chosen audience, for the boys who have read the preceding volumes of the series heartily endorse them, so that, were the choice of their reading matter left to them the author might be reasonably assured of a place amongst the best-sellers. Lothrop, Lee and Shepard are the publishers.

London on Revolution

Jack London is busily gathering up the scattered fragments of his writings, and in "Revolution" he presents a baker's dozen of essays written at various times and places and published in widely scattered periodicals. A goodly proportion of these are Socialistic and vigorously Socialistic at that, for their author is thoroughly in earnest and no half-hearted missionary ever yet made a convert. He assumes as a matter of course that only Socialists have any interest in the welfare of their fellow-creatures, and that there is no salvation outside his particular creed, and he preaches the millennium as energetically as any old time religionist. "What Life Means to Me" is to some extent a condensation of his recent novel, "Martin Eden," with a termination diametrically opposite. "The Yellow Peril" is an outcome of the author's experience in the Japanese war, and "The Gold Hunters of the North" a tribute to the early pioneers of Alaska. "Foma Gordyeef" and "These Bones Shall Rise Again," are appreciations of Gorky and Kipling, but what will make the most direct appeal to the largest number of readers are "The Other Animals," a reply to the Roosevelt-Burroughs denunciation of "nature fakirs," of whom Mr. London was mentioned amongst the chief of offenders, and "The Golden Poppy," which ought to be reprinted every year when the flowers begin to blossom, ordered in unlimited quantities bu the out-door art leagues and city-beautifiers, and distributed broadcast by the Floral Association. It is a simple narrative of the author's efforts to prevent the extermination of the Eschscholtzia on his own property, while trying to show some sympathy with the "nature lovers" who, professing to love flowers, in practice love only to destroy them. Even if one cared for nothing else in the book, "The Golden Poppy" would make it worth while to own, but it is a very good book to have, especially in these days of half-heartedness, when so much of the literary output is literary and literally work, something to be got through with in the hope that it will furnish an income. It is good to find force behind words even if one does not accept the gospel in its entirety. Macmillans, who have published nearly all of Mr. London's books, are also the sponsors for this new volume.

He Knew the World

In Lanarkshire there lived a laird named Hamilton, who was noted for his peculiarities. On a certain occasion a neighbor waited upon him, asking the favor as a neighbor of a loan of $100. It was only a bill of accommodation for three months, which led to the following reply:

"Na, na; I canna do that."

"What for no, laird? Ye have dune the same thing for ithers."

"Aye, aye, Tammas; but there's wheels within ye ken naething aboot! I canna do it."

"It's a sma' affair to refuse me, laird."

"Weel, ye see, Tammas, if I was to pit my name tell't ye wad get the siller frae the bank, and when th' time cam' roond ye wadna be ready, and I wad hae to pay't, sae you and we wad quarrel. We may as weel quarrel the noo, as lang as the siller is in my pooch."

Husband—Did you hunt up the new cook's references?

Wife—No, John, I didn't. I was afraid they might prove prejudicial.

Upson—Do you have to be examined by a physician before joining the Aviators' Club?

Downing—No; not until after you have made your first flight.

Husband (at the theater, to his wife—I hope you have noticed, darling, that between Acts I and II four years are supposed to elapse, and the actress who takes the part of the Countess wears the same dress. You could very well follow her example.

$3.50 Recipe Cures Weak Kidneys FREE

Relieves Urinary and Kidney Troubles, Backache, Straining, Swelling, etc. Stops Pain in the Bladder, Kidneys and Back.

Wouldn't it be nice within a week or so to begin to say goodbye forever to the scalding, dribbling, straining, or too frequent passage of urine; the forehead and the back-of-the-head aches; the stitches and pains in the back; the growing muscle weakness; spots before the eyes; yellow skin; sluggish bowels; swollen eyelids or ankles; leg cramps; unnatural short breath; sleeplessness and the despondency?

I have a recipe for these troubles that you can depend on, and if you want to make a quick recovery, you ought to write and get a copy of it. Many a doctor would charge you $3.50 just for writing this prescription, but I have it and will be glad to send it to you entirely free. Just drop me a line like this: Dr. A. E. Robinson, K 601 Luck Building, Detroit, Mich., and I will send it by return mail in a plain envelope. As you will see when you get it, this recipe contains only pure, harmless remedies, but it has great healing and pain-conquering power.

It will quickly show its power once you use it, so I think you had better see what it is without delay. I will send you a copy free—you can use it and cure yourself at home.

Pacific Street Wharf Flood Building Market St. Ferry Depot

For the first time in fifty years the property owners of the East Bay Cities have the making of the water rate in their hands.

IN our contract we guarantee a steady decrease in the rate until it reaches 25 cents per thousand gallons. Our rate is 32 cents on 5,000,000 gallons, and 25 cents on 19,000,000. This means that you pay 27 cents, probably 25 cents a thousand gallons for the first water you buy of us. Our coming into the East Bay Cities means a saving to the property owners of $500,000 a year, or $5,000,000 in ten years.

But we cannot afford to spend the $12,000,000 to $15,000,000 necessary to bring our water here if the property owners will not agree to buy our water to the amount of 5,000,000 gallons per day. We have already spent over $100,000 perfecting our plans and specifications, having brought them to that point where we can start work 24 hours after the order is given.

With an expenditure of millions of dollars the Bay Cities Water Co. has acquired a chain of water sheds and water rights unequaled by any other water company in the world. These rights comprise the South Fork of the American River, Echo, Silver, Audrain, Twin, Devils, and sixteen other Sierra lakes—water properties on the Consumnes River, and thousands of acres of lands and water rights on the four sides of Mt. Hamilton. With these sources at our command, we can supply the East Bay Cities with 300,000,000 gallons of pure water per day.

By bringing our water into your city, you bring the insurance rates down, for we propose to supply all the cities' hydrants through 6-inch mains, not through 2 and 4-inch mains. In the construction of our system we will follow closely the laws laid down by the National Board of Fire Underwriters, thereby insuring you the best possible fire protection.

In the contracts we ask you to sign, we do not bind ourselves to a certain rate for one year, as Mr. Dingee did when he entered the local field, only to jump the rate up higher than it ever was in water history. We bind ourselves, our heirs, executors, or assigns to certain rates for ten years, and we are perfectly willing to make it twenty years.

Contracts are pouring in upon us now by the thousands, but we want more—we want yours. We want enough to warrant us in making the rate 25 cents per thousand gallons by the time we begin to deliver water into your house.

Upon your decision and that of your neighbor, rests the momentous question of whether or not your city is to have this magnificent water system.

The Prophet and the Pilgrims

Oyster Bay has become the Mecca of the Insurgents and all the idols of the Chautauqua circle. The pilgrimage to the shrine of the sovereign lord of the nation is a continuous procession. The steady tramp of many feet echoes from the slopes of Sagamore Hill where the aureoled and dauntless hero of that other acclivity celebrated in song and story as Kettle Hill is holding imperial court, receiving the homage of the only guaranteed patriots and beaming on them affectionately as on their marrowbones they thump their briskets and chant their hymns of loyalty. An inspiring spectacle this, of the Prophet giving audience to his beloved disciples and assuring them of his appreciation of their unwavering devotion to the true faith. From the smiles that illumine returning countenances, and other eloquent phenomena too numerous to mention, it is inferred that the words of encouragement with which the hearts of the pilgrims are gladdened bode ill for the incorrigible standpatters and all their malign works and sinister pomps. Consequently the news that radiates from the hub of political activity is poignantly affecting to politicians in every State in the union. Grave misgivings are filling the hearts of Mr. Taft's adherents, there is rejoicing among the righteous overmuch. Meanwhile the President is pursuing the even tenor of his way, apparently more concerned about Colonel Bogie than about Colonel Roosevelt. And occasionally faint rumors are wafted this way to the effect that the great apostle of peace is about to undertake the harmonization of the G. O. P. According to these rumors Mr. Roosevelt has experienced a change of temperament. The pleasures of discord no longer appeal to his erratic fancy. He has broadened his sympathies to comprehend all factions, and would like very much to reconcile insurgents and regulars and send his party into the fray as a solid phalanx against the enemy.

A New Idea Born in Chicago

From Chicago, the fountainhead of culturine, comes the news of the birth of a "New Christianity" in the divinity school of the somewhat bizarre university of that opulent city. This new religion is to "release men's minds from the bonds of tradition and creed." It will stand with geology in preference to Genesis and it will accept "the assured results of historical investigation into the records of ancient times"; for, while "religion has its rights, so also has history." Which reminds us that nowhere does "a little learning" flourish so luxuriantly as in our pampered universities where young schoolmasters are masquerading as great scholars and stuffing the immature minds of budding citizens with osophies and isms that were discarded by the learned of centuries agone. The promulgation of the principles of this so-called New Christianity is but another instance of the unjustifiable pride of intellect that is incessantly cutting curious capers in the academic groves. The idea that religion and science are incompatible is not new. The arguments pro and con on the question of their incompatibility would fill many volumes, and it is doubtful whether the question is ever to be solved to the satisfaction of all men of intelligence and learning. The only thing of which we can be sure is that when the Bible appears to clash with science we cannot be certain that we have a correct interpretation of Scripture. This being the case is it not clearly futile to quarrel on the subject. William E. Gladstone, who wrote a book to prove that there was no conflict between Genesis and geology, said that the nearest semblance to a palpable contradition between modern Science and Holy Writ that he was able to find was upon the statement that sin brought death into the world. We know that death was antecedent to man and therefore to sin. But in Scripture, beyond all dispute, the word death has many meanings. For example, it means severance of spirit and body; it means separation from God and domination of body over spirit; it means reunion with God, and domination of spirit over body. Now how will the Chicago professors determine in what sense St. Paul used the word? And how are these professors to ascertain what are "the assured results of historical investigation?" "What is history," said Napoleon, "but fiction agreed upon." Said Walpole, "All history is a lie." When Frederick the Great would have his secretary read history to him he would say, "Bring me my liar." According to Alexander Dumas, "Truth is very liable to be left-handed in history." According to Dr. Johnson there is very little authentic history. Nevertheless the Chicago professors, being men of superior wisdom, if they have not faith in religion, have an abundance of it in history. Above all they have faith in science. How learned they are in science is another matter. We are assured by eminent authority that the person who thinks there is conflict between science and religion must either be very young in science or very ignorant in religion.

The Mexican Despotism

One may be in doubt as to whether Porfirio Diaz, President of Mexico, is a benevolent despot or a typical tyrant, but it is clear enough that his personally conducted ship of state is no longer sailing in smooth waters. Also it is clear enough that the persons who have vested rights under the Mexican despotism, protected by the great autocrat, are keenly apprehensive on account of the rapid growth of sentiment hostile to Diaz at home as well as abroad. Affairs in Mexico have seemed to be approaching a crisis. And though Diaz may be able to quell disturbances and hold the people in submission by the methods usually employed by despots it is almost certain that on his death the republic will be rent with factional strife. But even now it is deemed essential to the stability of his administration to manufacture sentiment in his favor in this country, and to that end special writers are employed to celebrate his benevolence and wisdom in certain magazines and dailies. Thus we find Alfred Henry Lewis, special writer for Mr. Hearst, who has very large interests in Mexico, eulogizing Diaz in extravagant terms. According to Lewis the President of Mexico is a great patriot who "has fought, suffered, starved, moiled, toiled and lived for Mexico." Furthermore the anti-Mexican campaign, Lewis tells us, is financed by that eternal, omnipresent malefactor, the Standard Oil. British writers who have visited Mexico to study conditions have another story to tell. According to Channing Arnold and Frederick J. Tabor Frost, a state of anarchy is bound to ensue in Mexico on the death of Diaz. These writers tells us that the people have many grievances. They are oppressed "under a shameful system of virtual slavery. There have been many massacres by Mexican troops." "Judges of the courts in Mexico," says Senor Barron in an article published in The Editorial Review, "are creatures of the President. The gravest cases are decided in the course of a morning call at the National Palace. President Diaz wields discretionary power over the property, freedom and life of every Mexican, and is not accountable to anyone for any one of his acts." We should not believe all that we read about Diaz. Doubtless he has done much good for the country by his despotic methods; for he has at least subdued the Latin temperament and maintained a certain kind of social order; but it is absurd to picture him as a great patriot. Great patriots concern themselves about the permanent welfare of the people. A despotism even though it be benevolent is a selfish system of government that always carries with it the menace of anarchy.

The Charms of Political Strife

One of the direct results of the direct primary is the awakening somewhat earlier than usual of public interest in the ambitions of certain distinguished gentlemen who are eager to pull the public leg for a term of years. Before the discovery of the great blessing which we are now experiencing it was said of us Americans that we were much too preoccupied with material acquisition, and that all our multifarious talents were devoted and subordinated to the accumulation of money. This awful reproach is no longer justified. For the direct primary has taken our mind off the most enchanting but lowest aim of existence. We are now almost exclusively preoccupied with politics. Public interest is centred in the rival claims of ardent patriots. Heretofore the politicians occupied our attention not more than a few weeks each year, and the rest of the time we were absorbed in sordid occupations. Now the closed season for gladhanding is less than half the year. For more than six months we are to be entertained with the antics of the ground and lofty performers in the political arena, and our interest is keyed to a high pitch by the exciting uncertainty of the outcome of a contest that deeply, vitally concerns the whole State. The new order of things is to say the least diverting. And doubtless it is for the benefit of all of us; for at any rate it causes us to take a keener interest in the most edifying of all sports—that which is conducted by the gentlemen whom Shakespeare tells us are capable of circumventing God. Who cares whether as a result of the protraction of politics we shall be better governed than before? We who are not of the general—we whose privilege it is to peep behind the scenes, to be in touch with men and cognizant of their motives, designs and machinations may speculate on this purely academic question, but it is not for us to utter ourselves oracularly and attempt to disillusion the enchanted populace. Not for us because we know the futility of seeking to dissipate illusions. Believing that we have as much right as the dear people to enjoy ourselves we find our enjoyment in our own way. When we read what is said in the incorruptible dailies about the candidates, the invulnerable virtues of this one, the innumerable vices of that one, we meditate profitably on the incredible credulity of the average molecule of the masses, the same molecule that but a short time ago was devouring with feverish avidity the esoteric flapdoodle from the training quarters in Nevada, never dreaming that it was adapted to the intellectuals of stupidity in bulk. Knowing that the people love to be hoodwinked the dailies treat them with uniform disingenuousness whether they are booming a prize fight or a political faction. So it is but affording the dailies a suitable opportunity for the performance of a cardinal duty to make election contests as nearly in the nature of a continuous performance as possible. So we may conclude that whatever be the effect of the direct primary on government its operation is conducive to the gratification of the popular appetite. Indeed to believe that such is not the case is to incur the suspicion that one is a hopeless antique in a whirling world of unprecedented progress. The direct primary is the most precious of all the darling contrivances of the cognoscenti of politics. It is the pet product of the cult of progress, the high-water mark on the glistening shores of Innovation. As we ponder it we become sensible of the hearty laugh we should have at the expense of that old-fashioned statesman Abe Lincoln were he with us today. How profoundly we should humiliate him by quoting him thus: "If ever this free people—if this government itself is ever utterly demoralized, it will come from this incessant human wriggle and struggle for office, which is but a way to live without work." What a low estimate Abe had of the gentlemen who practice the divine art of being wise for others! Ponder his cruel intimation that politics means all for office, nothing for principle; all for self, nothing for the people. How little of the prophetic power was possessed by this great statesman who failed to foresee the organization of a faction in his name led by a Hiram Johnson divinely commissioned to ameliorate the condition of mankind, and wholly oblivious to self-interest! And how far was he from apprehending the advantages of living in a State committed to that interminable political strife which, according to the unwise of former generations, has a tendency to corrupt the mind and ulcerate the heart. Thrice blessed are we who are being taught by experience that political issues "create the according music of a well-mixed State." 'Rah for the direct primary! Long may she wave!

More Power for the People

"The thing to do," says the Examiner, "is to restore to the people their legitimate power to order their own public affairs. Government will be safe with the people." The sentiment is somewhat familiar. We believe we have come across it before. Indeed we are quite sure that it is the sentiment that Aristophanes satirized in one of his plays when he himself played the role of Cleon some four hundred years before the Christian era. "More power for the people" is a fine slogan. It never fails to win popular favor; nor has it ever failed to seduce the people to their own undoing. How safe the government is in the hands of the people we know from the uniform experience of peoples of many climes, of many ages and under diverse systems of popular government. How safe government may be in the hands of the people of this country we have had an opportunity of judging from a recent occurrence at Washington. The House which is directly representative of the people decided by an overwhelming vote to amend a criminal law for the purpose of exempting from its operations and penalties a numerically powerful element of the people. Now it is needless to point out that the object of government is to provide equal justice for all classes of citizens or to suggest that no government can endure that fails to secure this object. The mere statement of the fact is as platitudinous as the most insipid truism that was ever didactically set forth by the illustrious personage who won his way to the hearts of his countrymen by repeated discoveries of the Decalogue. This being the case it is obvious that what the cowardly representatives of the people in the lower house of Congress did in deference to the demands of the union labor leaders was a species of treachery fraught with somewhat dangerous consequences. But however lightly we may view the matter the point to be kept in mind is that the representatives of the people were false to their trust from a sense of what they conceived to be their own political advantage; also that in this instance we have a concrete example of the inadvisability of governing the people without certain checks and balances of power. The check in this instance was supplied by the Senate. The Senate blocked the legislation proposed by the House. Let us suppose that the people were represented in the Senate in precisely the same way as they were represented in the House and reflect on what might have happened. Is it likely that a Senate composed of men elected directly by the people and as eager to conciliate their constituents as are the members of the House would have had the courage to defy the selfish incivism of the truculent bosses of organized labor? To give the question a graver aspect let us suppose that the proposition before the Congress was one affecting our relations with some powerful nation and that it had arisen in another emergency similar to that which grew out of the blowing up of the Maine. Could we depend on a Senate of servile politicians to resist the importunities of public clamor? We know that the Senate as at present constituted and elected lacked backbone in the historical emergency to which we have alluded; but how much more pronounced would be the invertebrate state of that body if all Senators were as profoundly concerned about majorities as are all Representatives! The thwarting by the Senate of the impudent agitators of organized labor is an achievement that demonstrates the wisdom of the men who drafted our Constitution. They gave us two houses of Congress, and that each might act as a check on the other they made one extremely sensitive to the public will and one in a measure inaccessible to public clamor. In thus providing against the despotic and impulsive power of the multitude they were not experimenting in theories of government. The system of two separate and distinct houses of the legislature is founded on a principle as old as the common law. But not for its age alone was it reverenced. Wherever the system which is now proposed by the modern disciples of Cleon has been tried it has proved a failure. France, Spain, Naples, Portugal, our own pre-federal Confederacy—all experimented with a single house and found it a failure. Now we are urged to put our trust in two houses constituted in such a way as to produce practically two committees of the same house. By this method are the people asked to assume more power. This is what Mr. Hearst means when he says that "the thing to do is to restore to the people their legitimate power." Thus would Mr. Hearst augment his own power. For it is when the people are apparently all-powerful that they are most completely under the thumbs of the men who make public opinion.

A Remarkable Courtesan

Being a Short Appreciation of a Very Interesting and Valuable Book Entitled "A German Pompadour," the Work of Marie Hay

By Edward F. O'Day

From the distant day of Father Herodotus to the present time history has delighted to dally with the careers of courtesans. In the Biblical narrative and in the profane records of the ancient monarchies and republics courtesans played an important part; so too in modern times, particularly in France. To understand how a beautiful or clever woman may gain left-handed dominion over a prince and a people involves an intimate study of feminine psychology and as that is a subject which philosophers have been studying for centuries without perceptible increase of knowledge the quest has all the fascination of mystery—it intrigues the imagination and stimulates the brain. What was the secret of Aspasia's charm? How did the Pompadour lord it over one of the lords of earth? Here are questions that can only be partially answered and any new data thrown into the argument should receive the recognition its importance deserves. Decidedly Marie Hay has supplied us with new data in her delightful book "A German Pompadour" recently issued in attractive dress by Charles Scribner's Sons.

This is the extraordinary history of a woman of whom not one in ten thousand of us has ever before heard. Yet she played a remarkable part in her world and more than one monarch had cause to damn her great gift of beauty. Her name was Wilhelmine von Gravenitz and she flourished in the German principality of Wirtemberg at the beginning of the eighteenth century. Her story as told by Marie Hay is compact of the stuff of romance and it is a pleasure to say that it has lost nothing in the telling. The book is an extraordinary tour de force because, as the author tells us in her preface, only a dusty, time-soiled packet of legal papers which had lain untouched for nearly two hundred years was available as material for the reconstruction of the life of this Wirtemberg beauty. Marie Hay is mistress of the period of which she writes and with only that packet of legal papers has produced a story with all the charm of romantic fiction and all the grip of actual fact.

It was an intrigue planned by a few unscrupulous courtiers which brought Wilhelmine von Gravenitz to the court of Stuttgart where the handsome, brave and polished Duke Eberhard Ludwig of Wirtemberg held sway. She was a poor young girl from the south, remarkably beautiful. There was a dimple in her chin and another near her lips. She was very tall, lithe of limb and spare as a Greek runner but very full breasted. Her hair was deep brown with a glint of gold and almost too abundant. In her blue eyes there was a strange look of concentration which in a later age would have been ascribed to hypnotic power. The brutal advances of a lustful pastor had taught her the spell of her beauty before she was summoned to Stuttgart by her brother and other intriguers to captivate the duke's susceptible heart and thereby help to feather their nests. This was a sordid business, of course, and Wilhelmine had no scruples of maidenly modesty about doing her part. Her beauty, however, and the romantic surroundings conspire with Marie Hay's artistic handling of the narrative to gild the theme.

Duke Eberhard Ludwig was a soldier and a poet but he was not a faithful husband. His wife did not appeal to him and Wilhelmine did; so in a very short time this peasant girl was established as the reigning favorite and the career of the German Pompadour had commenced. It was a marvelous career and one wonders that it was never before exhumed from the grave of history. Before her coming the family life of the Wirtemberg ducal circle had been simple, stiff and dull; under her influence it became a brilliant, festive court which, travelers tell us, vied in magnificence with the glories of Versailles.

There was no ambiguity about the position of Wilhelmine at Stuttgart. She was the duke's acknowledged mistress and neither the pining sorrow of his humiliated wife nor the mutterings of the scandalized Wirtembergers disturbed the impetuous ardor of his love affair. Like the upstart that she was Wilhelmine was inordinately proud and inordinately jealous of her shaky position. She hated her lover's wife, she hated his people and her public actions proclaimed her feelings. Soon the populace came to hate her and to suspect her of witchcraft. The truth is that she was as bad as she was beautiful and made more than one attempt to kill the duke's wife.

One of the most extraordinary episodes of her career was her marriage to the duke, a solemn mockery that was bigamy pure and simple but which served to embroil the Austrian empire for a long time, owing to the duke's insistence on its validity. As the "wife" of the duke Wilhelmine gave free rein to her extravagance and even today the Wirtemberg peasants speak of her as the Land Despoiler. Her court was brilliant but wanton, one of the most remarkable gathering places for the dishonest brave and the unscrupulous fair that Europe ever knew. Then like a thunderbolt came an order from the Emperor of Austria, the duke's suzerain, exiling her from the empire.

That was the beginning of the end. As she had suddenly risen she as quickly fell. Her poetical lover had the bad grace to tire of her before her cup of misfortune filled to overflowing so that she tasted the worst bitterness which can come to a woman in her position. It would be unfair to the reader who may desire to read the book for himself to detail the strong scenes which conclude this veracious chronicle. It is history but it reads like a novel and nobody cares to have the ending of a novel revealed in advance. Suffice it that after twenty years of extraordinary power and fifteen of almost equal misery Wilhelmine von Gravenitz died.

There is absolutely nothing to indicate that she was not scrupulously faithful to her ducal lover during all the time of her ascendancy and greatly as Marie Hay seems to fancy the most effective collocation of her material I do not think that she would suppress the fact if it was indicated in the little packet of legal papers from which she reconstructed this story. A remarkable courtesan was Wilhelmine von Gravenitz and when we lay aside the book dealing with her life we apprehend a little more of the truth about the influence which such women can exert, the manner in which they keep themselves in power and the causes of their almost inevitable fall.

PORTLAND SAN FRANCISCO LOS ANGELES

A Paris Cafe

By Filson Young

It exists to gratify appetite rather than to satisfy hunger; it is one of the great granaries of wild oats that have been established in cosmopolitan Paris as a kind of international reserve of that commodity, in case the crop should ever fail. In a word, it is a restaurant held in great repute by the disreputable, famous among the infamous, as well as among the great throng of the reputable and the famous who in their hours of relaxation or curiosity have at one time or another sat at its tables.

It is hard for anyone who has never been there, or in some similar place in Paris or Vienna, to realize what it is like. It is hard for one sitting six hundred miles away, with the sound of the sea in his ears, to believe that it is a real place, or that its tragic life goes on in daily ebb and flow, as punctual as the tides, whether he remembers it or not. Such a chain of reality intervenes—downs, windswept in the stormy night; the salt dark waves of the Channel; fields newly turned by the plough; cottages, farmsteads, docks, railways, towns—and at the end of this dark perspective, as I look in imagination, the lurid spot of light in the heart of Paris that might well to the Puritan mind stand for an image of Hela, or reveal the company of the damned sitting feasting in the very glare of Tophet. Yet if I were suddenly to be transported across the intervening miles—I, or anyone willing to view what he saw with a mind open and sensitive to impression, we should at once begin to fall under the spell; to find it interesting, to find it fascinating, to feel that it was reality, and that the world beyond was a phantom and a dream. A very real and strenuous life—the life of Paris herself, the life of France—flows round it, as a broad river eddies and swirls round an islet, leaving it forgotten or unheeded; on the one side of the wall there is the modern world of industry, commerce, politics—on the other this frank Pagan worship of Bacchus and Venus.

There is nothing particularly French about it; nothing Parisian, even, in the true sense of the word—except in so far as it represents something foreign which can yet only flourish to perfection in Paris—that friendly soil to which (to use a contradiction) so many alien plants are indigenous. There are so many Parises—the Paris of the artist, of the diplomat, of the financier, of the milliner, of the rich Jew, of the poor Frenchman, the Paradise of the American, the Inferno of the Puritan—and each feels that he, and he alone, holds the key to her fascinating mysteries. Our cafe belongs to none of these; it is of the Paris of expensive pleasure, designed for that cosmopolitan race of money-spenders that Paris in her heart so dearly loves and so warmly welcomes. Englishmen and Americans are its chief patrons—because it represents something that cannot exist in England or America. New York may imitate the externals, but it cannot achieve the nameless atmosphere of gaiety, the heartless happiness of Paris. There was—happily is no more—a terrible and doleful travesty of it in London; a place which offered a spectacle of intrinsic indecency and horror only possible in a Puritan country and under a grandmotherly legislation; for grandmothers, however active they may be for our welfare, cannot go everywhere, and have a way of assuming that the horrors they do not see are all right, or else are necessary horrors. A cafe like this in London is as impossible as Simpson's would be in Buda-Pesth. It represents something which the Englishman, if he recognizes its existence at all, prefers to keep outside his native life; a commodity which he is content to purchase in a foreign market, and has no ambition to produce at home—which in this case is sound fiscal wisdom, and the only true Protection.

There is nothing aesthetically indecent about it or ugly to the eye. Laughter is not ugly; women's clothes, as made in Paris, are not often ugly; bright eyes are not ugly; wine and flowers and jewels, and the demeanor of people willing to amuse and to be amused, are not ugly; to see people happy, amused, forgetful of the shadowy side of life, for however brief a time or by whatever means, is not an ugly sight. And the interest of our cafe just depends on how far you take it for what it offers and pretends to be, and not for what it actually is or may be. Tragedies and mortal sins are not its concern; you go there on your own responsibility; if you cannot enjoy yourself there without these disagreeable consequences, that is your own affair. In other words, it is a little corner of the universe raised, so to speak, to a higher power; the laws that obtain there are the laws that govern life everywhere; like every part and corner of the earth it is a school of philosophy for those who wish to learn, and a school of damnation for those who wish to be damned. You may learn your philosophy a little sooner or be damned a little quicker there than in other places—that is all.

That is why our cafe is interesting to artists, and to all of us whose business it is to study human nature in as many places and under as many different conditions as possible; that is why the faces of some of its frequenters have been seen on so many canvases, and faces and characters alike given an immortality so strangely inconsistent with their brief destinies. There is something in its atmosphere—an atmosphere from which the ugly vice of hypocrisy is entirely absent—that acts as a reagent on certain natures, selecting and precipitating the more human qualities. Men, at any rate, are very much themselves there; even the fearfully-minded, and those suffering from a sense of misbehavior, are fortified by a consciousness that all are in the same boat, and the absence of the disapproving eye seems to release something in their facial expression, so that a face which may be familiar to us as hard, or furtive, or mean, becomes transfigured, and beams openly with frank and genial enjoyment. A sense of shame may be a very salutary virtue—I am not so sure of that; at any rate, it is very demeaning to the appearance; and it is to the credit of this place that you will never see anyone look ashamed there. You may see faces tired, wearied to death; you may see faces sorry, faces angry, you may see the expressions of hatred, desire, and jealousy in all their terrible nakedness; but the disfigurement of shame on a human countenance I think you will not see there. The reason is, that people are there either themselves or are accepted for what they wish to seem; and, in these circumstances, no one is ever ashamed.

The interest of these midnight hours as a human spectacle depends entirely on how deep you go. You must not go deep at all if you wish to be a partner with the spirit of gaiety. It is all a surface, polished and faceted; the joy is as deep as a mirror—no deeper. On the surface you have laughter, pretty faces, eager eyes, wine, flowers, stimulation of all the centres of sensuous enjoyment. Look a little deeper, and you will notice the tiredness that underlies the gaiety on some of these beautiful women's faces, and, I fear, the extreme vacuity of some of the men's; the gaiety seems artificial. A little deeper, it is the sheer interest and curiosity of it that will appeal to you, quite impersonally. A little deeper, and you see that under the glittering surface, moving to the captivating measure of the music, a little

The Dogs of Stamboul

More than one Sultan has tried to get rid of the swarming street dogs of Constantinople by exposing them on uninhabited islands; but the dogs swam back. Once more, on the 18th of May, while the natives were looking in vain for the comet, a raid was begun which is to be continued until the streets are cleared of some 50,000 dogs. Preceded by gypsies, who beat them from their lairs, a number of catchers, armed with large iron grappling-hooks, seized the yelling creatures and deposited them in vans. The native populace is, as a whole, still strongly averse to the measures adopted, since the beasts for two thousand years or more have acted as scavengers. To remove them is, they believe, to invite the wrath of heaven. Some of them concealed the animals in their quarters night after night till the catchers had passed. As the authorities did not dare, on account of superstition, to kill the dogs, they were imprisoned within the old town walls, the result being inevitable cruelty to animals. The situation is extremely difficult to deal with, and not a few observers believe that this attempt to get rid of the canine scavengers is also doomed to failure. Yet something must be done. The dogs obstruct traffic more and more, and by their howling make sleep almost impossible, at least to resident foreigners.

The Death of an Inventor

Joseph Thomas, an old-time inventor, has died at his home in Hoboken, of general breakdown incident to old age. He was eighty-three years old. He was a brother of General Valentine Thomas, who served with distinction under Napoleon in the Franco-Prussian War. Joseph Thomas was born in a suburb of Paris, France, on March 19, 1827, and came to this country at the age of nineteen. He became a machinist's apprentice and early began to display his inventive genius and made many useful mechanical devices, and the men who promoted their manufacture made most of the money. Mr. Thomas was employed by Isaac Merritt Singer at the time Singer was perfecting his sewing machine in a garret in New York City, and together the young men invented important devices which made the Singer machine a success. The invention of the first machine for the manufacture of sulphur matches was considered by Mr. Thomas as his greatest work. The machine was able to turn out 20,000 matches a minute. It was on exhibition at the Crystal Palace in New York City in the early sixties, and thousands of people gazed in wonder as it worked. Mr. Thomas invented a steel wire hoop skirt which soon became all the rage in this country and elsewhere in the early fifties. He perfected a secret process of tempering steel so that the hoops were pliable and easily accommodated themselves to the stout or slender fair ones who wore the skirts. Like most geniuses Mr. Thomas was not a success as a business man. He had too great faith in the honesty of other people and was often the victim of too much confidence.

The Scare in Politics

The efficacy of a popular scare as a weapon in politics is fully recognized in England and scaremongering has been reduced to scientific exactitude. It is generally conceded now that the widespread fear of a German invasion was fanned by political leaders to force the building of Dreadnaughts or in default of that, to retire the ruling party. Now that the Dreadnaught scare has produced its desired effect, the attention of the people has been turned to the pretended danger of an invasion by means of submarines. The British navy is now overwhelmingly superior in Dreadnaughts but it is lacking in submarines and torpedo boats. So the English people are being told that German submarines would find easy access to the shores of England if they saw fit to make an attack at the present time. It is urged that Great Britain devote all her energies and money to building a fleet of these crafts as fast as possible. It is fully expected that before long popular opinion will be so worked up that the majority party will have to build submarines or retire from power. It is thus that the game is played in England.

The Greatest Caisson

A record in building foundation construction work was established recently in New York with the completion of a caisson for the new Municipal Building at the Manhattan terminal of the Brooklyn Bridge. The foundation runs 112 feet 1 inch below water level. This is the deepest caisson ever constructed, and it was built without accident of any kind. The maximum air pressure at the bottom during the work was forty-seven pounds to the square inch, and the men worked in twenty shifts of five each, remaining in the chambers for an average of forty minutes.

The Slaughter of Birds

Startling figures regarding the slaughter of birds for the Paris and London millinery markets were given recently by a lecturer of the Selborne Society in London. "Bird life," he said, "is being reduced at an alarming rate by the traffic in feathers and the killing in the breeding season, when feathers have full luster, smoothness and elasticity. During 1898, 1,538,738 egrets were killed in Venezuela for their plumes, and in 1908 the number had fallen to 257,916—the effect of ten years' slaughter. The same thing is happening in every country where the white heron is found. There has been growing for the last ten years a demand in the millinery market for the large white wings and tail feathers of the American jabiru, the largest but one of all living storks. In London alone 30,000 of these quills are sold annually. The bird would have been annihilated long ago, but it scented danger from man and his fowling piece, though today, in the middle Crinoer basin, its favorite feeding ground, it is shot by a soft-nosed bullet from a Mauser rifle, and thus woman's wish is gratified. Besides the egret, 10,612 pounds weight of other plumage is exported from Ciudad Bolivar. Besides being extravagantly wasteful of bird life and terribly cruel, the plume trade is aggravated by illegal practices. Although in 1903 the government of India passed a law prohibiting the export of the skins and feathers of all wild birds, the most useful and beautiful birds continue to pour into the London market, being clandestinely conveyed out of India under fictitious names and addresses, and the cases falsely declared as containing cow hair, horse hair or flimsy silk material."

Investigating Mrs. "Ducksey"

Two weeks ago I mentioned that John Slate, the star man of the New York World, was in town on a mysterious mission. I find now that this mission is one in which San Franciscans will manifest a particular interest. Slate is out here to investigate the career of Mrs. "Ducksey" Rosenbaum. Mrs. "Ducksey" or Mrs. Sadie Maguire Rosenbaum Rogers Dunne, to give her all the name that she is entitled to, has a libel suit against the New York World for $200,000, and Slate is gathering evidence for use when the case comes to trial. It will be remembered that Mrs. "Ducksey's" third husband who was interested in the Savoy Hotel in this city took French leave of his better half one day and departed for New York with a Mrs. Rogers. "Mrs. Ducksey" started in pursuit and overtook the errant couple on the board walk of Atlantic City. So enraged was Mrs. "Ducksey" at her husband's infidelity that she lambasted Mrs. Rogers with an umbrella. The New York World in telling the story stated that Mrs. "Ducksey" had been the mistress of a notorious house in this city. It happened that this statement was incorrect and Mrs. "Ducksey" promptly filed in the New York courts two suits, one for libel against the New York World and another for the same amount against Mrs. Rogers for alienation of her husband's affections.

Her Colorful Career

I am sure that Mr. Slate must find his work exceedingly interesting. Who that knew the night life of the old San Francisco does not remember the variegated doings of Sadie Maguire? The narrative of the manner in which she is reputed to have snared the affections of "Ducksey" Rosenbaum would demand the pen of a Balzac or a de Maupassant. Only Gautier could do justice to some of her other adventures. She was a familir figure around the old Palace Hotel and on the bridle path of Golden Gate Park. A graceful equestrienne she was one of the first women in this city to desert the side saddle. When "Ducksey" Rosenbaum could no longer tolerate his physical wretchedness he took a dose of cyanide of potassium and Mrs. "Ducksey" was mistress of several hundred thousand dollars. Then she married Charley Rogers who promptly deserted newspaper work and became Rogers "the advertect." But that was a short-lived romance and it was some time afterwards that she became the wife of Dunne the hotel man. These are but the dry bones of her exuberant life. Any old-timer will fill in the skeleton with sprightly stories of strange caprices tinged with blue and rose.

Stowe Converted Into "Stone"

How disappointing it must be to a prominent citizen from the provinces to be discovered on Broadway by a reporter for a big metropolitan daily and interviewed for publication only to find his name printed wrong in the morning! This sometimes happens, for reporters are infallible with respect to names only when the news is of a scandalous nature. Now Mr. Vanderlyn Stowe never does anything scandalous, and of course the interview with this pink of propriety which appeared last week in the Sun was intended to give him enviable publicity. But alas! he was written up not as Stowe but as Stone. He was deemed of sufficient importance to be interviewed because he is an ex-president of the Bohemian Club. His election to the presidency was perhaps the greatest distinction he ever achieved. And his election gave the club a certain distinction for it has been known ever since as the plumbers' club by reason of the circumstance that his fitness for the presidency was inferred from his success in his plumbing and gas fixture business.

A Suspicion of Irony

After reading the interview with Mr. Stowe in the Sun I suspected the reporter of having trifled with the honored name of our prominent citizen in a spirit of malice. Reporters are not free from that spirit. And when it is aroused in them they assuage it by twisting the name of the person against whom they wish to vent their spleen. The reporter who interviewed Mr. Stowe probably expected to get from him material for a good story. And it is evident that the interview didn't pan out. "Mr. Stone," says the reporter, "doesn't look like a Bohemian bohemian, nor a Parisian bohemian nor the New York variety which affects table d'hotes where the wine is thrown in for 35 cents. He is a business man, being in the light fixture business and looks prosperous." Somewhat tinged is this, and much of what follows, with irony, for the reporter makes it clear enough in his deft way that he does not regard the ex-president of San Francisco's club of wits as a very keen-witted person. When one gentleman thinks another gentleman an ass he does not express himself frankly but implies what he thinks in the politest terms he can invent. I quote from the Sun:

"'Once a year we have jinks,' said Mr. Stone."

"'Drinks'? inquired the reporter thirstily."

"'No, jinks—j-i-n-k-s.'"

"'High jinks?'"

"'Well that depends. The jinks take place in the summer and last two weeks. * * * The time is the full of the moon of August.'"

"'And is there any superstition or tradition connected with the full of the moon in this case?'"

"'No. In the old days they chose the full of the moon because it was the cheapest way of lighting the camp.'"

From Jinks to Graft

Finding that Mr. Stowe was more grave than gay, that he was more inclined to solemnity than vivacity in conversation, the jocular reporter switched the conversation from playful topics to serious business.

"Is San Francisco better for the graft prosecution?" he asked.

"No," said the Bohemian Club's ex-president; "it is no better nor is it any worse than it was before the prosecutions. I am not prepared to say it was very bad then. San Francisco is a very cosmopolitan city. It has its Spanish quarter, its Italian quarter, its German and its Japanese quarters, and, thank God! we've got a few Americans there too." With this burst of real humor by which Mr. Stowe proved that wit may be latent even in a most prosperous looking business man the interview ended.

The Donners and the Murphys

In the card room of the Press Club the proposal to erect a monument to the Donner party was the subject of conversation. "Barney" Murphy of San Jose was too absorbed in a bridge hand to contribute to the discussion, although the Murphy party which included his father and grandfather arrived in California two years before the Donner party. "How is it, governor," queried Grant Carpenter, "that the Murphy party is not celebrated in history like the Donner party?" "Governor" Murphy removed the cigar from his mouth and with his eyes still fastened on his cards rejoined drily: "Well you see, Carpenter, the Murphys did not have the distinction of eating one another."

Martin Murphy's Estate

Speaking of the Murphys, I find that I am mistaken in saying two weeks ago that Martin Murphy died a poor man. It seems also that the Murphy home in San Jose was not sold because the estate was involved but because some of the heirs of Martin Murphy were minors. I was misled in my statements by an article in a San Jose newspaper. When Martin Murphy died he owned 75,000 acres of land stocked with cattle in San Luis Obispo County, 12,000 acres in Santa Barbara, the 5,000 acre ranch called Murphy's in Santa Clara County where he lived, 4,000 acres on the west side of the valley adjoining Stanford University, the 4,000 acre ranch of Milpitas and improved real estate in San Jose and San Francisco. Martin Murphy spent only two years in the old Murphy home in San Jose after which illness necessitated his removal to a place where he could receive the constant care of his doctor. Mrs. Murphy spent ten years in the old house.

"I wish you didn't have such a flat and plebeian nose, papa," said the aristocratic young daughter of the plain old merchant.
"That's the mark of the grindstone, my dear," replied the plodding old man.

Pugilism, Press and Pulpit

The gentlemen of the pulpit and all the proponents of universal austerity who are felicitating themselves on their glorious triumph over the evils of the prize-ring remind me of the fable about the fly and the wagon wheel. The wheel it will be remembered was revolving rapidly over a county road when the fly, perched on the hub, remarked, "What a lot of dust we are raising!" It was not in deference to ministerial protest that Governor Gillett put an end to preparations for the fight in San Francisco. Nor is it because of conniption fits thrown in the pulpit that a wave of sentiment hostile to the moving picture enterprise has rolled over the country. That sentiment is the result of race riots caused by the feeling that was inspired by the defeat of Jeffries. The pious gentlemen of this city who abominate pugilism and are persuaded that the tone of society is to be improved by the interdiction of professional fisticuffs, by a little reflection will perceive that there is less reason for exultation than for a quite different emotion. For though these gentlemen may be absolutely sincere in their vociferations against the degrading and demoralizing effects of pugilism, it is a matter of common notoriety that they have had no quarrel with the one great and powerful agency through which the brutal pastime is fostered and made profitable, and by means of which our pluguglies are made the objects of a most disgusting hero-worship. Manifestly the moral cowardice of our militant divines is in proportion to the sincerity of their aversion to pugilism. If they had the courage of their convictions they would have the courage to inveigh against the press as well as against the prize-ring and the other promoters of pugilism. If they regard the moving pictures as demoralizing then certainly the newspaper pictures do not meet with their approval; nor is it to be supposed they consider that the living pictures presented in a theater under newspaper auspices were by some mysterious process rendered innocuous.

Complaisant Pulpiteers

Judged from the standpoint of the clergymen the newspapers are more deserving of rebuke and reprobation that the fighters themselves. It was the newspapers that made the match. Jeffries, who had quit the ring, was goaded into the fight by a coterie of sporting editors. Long before any "promoter" took an interest in the matter the newspapers were manufacturing a sentiment in favor of a contest between the black man and the white man. They interviewed Jeffries on the subject, and when he said that he had no intention of returning to the ring they intimated that perhaps he was afraid to tackle the colored giant. It was by dint of newspaper taunts that Jeffries was induced to consent to the match. And all the while the pulpit was enveloped in an impenetrable cloak of silence. Nary a preacher permitted his tongue to luxuriate. Not a protest against the united efforts of the newspapers to incite men to the commission of crime emanated from the watchdogs of virtue. Not until after the match was made; not until the eleventh hour did the pulpit show signs of agitation. Nor did a single preacher then take exception to what the newspapers were doing toward exciting public interest. Yet it was impossible for anybody with the slightest delicacy of sensibility to read the news from the training camps without suffering an attack of nausea. What disgusting drivel was served up from day to day to the readers of the dailies by the experts in the argot of the slums who were frankly idolizing the beetle-browed heroes of the prize-ring! Not less demoralizing than the fight itself; nay, a thousand times more to be deplored, was the servile obsequiousness, the unconscious self-abasement that marked the tone of most of the "literature" that emanated from the training camps. But all the while the zealous guardians of society were complaisant. Perhaps they were so busy reading their prayer-books they had no time to glance at the newspapers.

A Pertinent Question

"One first question," says a great philosopher, "I ask of every man: Has he an aim which he follows with undivided soul? Whether his aim is a right one or a wrong one forms but my second question." By which I am reminded of our rampant divines. Do they follow their aim with undivided soul, or do they follow it only where the going is easy and turn back when they encounter that which they have not the courage to face? So far as I know the ultra-refined gentlemen of the pulpit who imagine that they precipitated the current spasm of morality cannot but answer the philosopher's first question in the negative. But peradventure I am mistaken. Perhaps Dr. Dille and his confreres have been exhorting the newspapers to be good. Perhaps they have been thundering against the wicked press without my knowledge. Or perhaps they have been expostulating with our erring journals by wireless or some other noiseless medium. Earnestly do I hope that it would be unjust to our reverend pulpiteers to assume that while conducting a crusade against the devil they have studiously refrained from giving offense to his most beloved handmaiden. I hope that Dr. Dille or somebody will come forward and dissipate all doubt on this subject. For so deep is my religious feeling that I hate to see the pulpit under humiliating suspicion. Far better that pugilists should be permitted to practice their brutalities for the pleasure of the unregenerate than that the professional expounders of Christianity should be found timidly and surreptitiously compromising with iniquity. Here "upon this bank and shoal of time" we can scarcely hope to attain anything better than a strong habitual belief in the freedom of the pulpit from cant, hypocrisy and moral cowardice.

The Death of Ambrose Bierce

Start not, gentle reader, at the heading of this paragraph. Ambrose Bierce has not actually departed this life. Reports from Berkeley where he is sojourning indicate that he is still vigorous mentally and physically. But it would seem that at least one of Bierce's most distinguished contemporaries was unaware of his continuance in the land of the living. I refer to Conan Doyle. I happened to pick up the other day the doctor's interesting book of literary causeries entitled "Through the Magic Door" and there I read this strange passage: "Talking of weird American stories, have you ever read any of the works of Ambrose Bierce? I have one of his works here, 'In the Midst of Life.' This man had a flavor quite his own, and was a great artist in his way. It is not cheering reading, but it leaves its mark upon you, and that is the proof of good work." This is a kindly tribute to one of Bierce's best works but Bierce has always been a stickler for grammatical accuracy and I doubt whether he will be disposed to forgive the substitution of the past for the present tense, even in an appreciation. A preterite panegyric may be better than none at all, but Bierce is not hard put to it for applause nowadays and he will not relish the thought that his later literary work has been so inconspicuous as to warrant the assumption that he is dead.

Edwards Davis Reappears

It is with a lively anticipation of amusement that I hail the reappearance within my ken of Edwards Davis, erstwhile Oakland clergyman, now full-fledged vaudevillain. It is years since I have heard the name of Davis but time has not dimmed my appreciation of his sensational personality and I await with eagerness his next contribution to the crusade against monotony. Edwards Davis was born to teach us that the world is far from being a dull place. He is a pastmaster in the art of exciting laughter and so committed to his work that little he recks if the laugh is turned against himself, as has been very frequently the case. After years of concealment—that is to say, concealment as far as we of San Francisco and Oakland are concerned—he heralds his return to our midst with an imposing disquisition on "The Rehabilitation of Oscar Wilde." I am given to understand that Edwards Davis is touring the Orpheum Circuit with a playlet founded on Wilde's morbid "Picture of Dorian Grey." Presumably he wrote the playlet himself. It must be interesting. Everything Edwards Davis does is interesting. His press agency is extremely interesting, albeit lacking in sounder qualities.

A Man of Temperament

Edwards Davis used to be an Oakland clergyman and was renowned from Berkeley to Leona Heights as the esthete of the pulpit. It was he who set the pace for the amazing Dr. Dille and other pyrotechnical preachers, a pace which they have been perspiringly keeping up ever since while he has turned serenely to pastures new. As a clergyman Edwards Davis was skilled in the arts of advertising. He was always doing something to attract attention to himself. He rode a wheel before bicycling became common, he wore a claw-hammer in the pulpit, he waltzed for his congregation. I remember dimly that he once appeared in knickerbockers and silk stockings that set off his shapely calves but shocked a good many members of his congregation. One day he married Alta Kingore who sang in his choir and they went East, Davis having resigned his pulpit. In New York Davis invented a drawing room game that sold well and kept the wolf from the door. Then he fell ill and went to a hospital while his wife went on the stage. Later on Mrs. Davis returned to Oakland and engaged an attorney to sue for a divorce, but she relented and soon husband and wife were doing vaudeville turns. When he played at the Macdonough in Oakland the general verdict was that his acting was atrocious. It seems that we are soon to have an opportunity to judge whether he has improved his mumming with the lapse of years.

His Essay on Wilde

Meanwhile Edwards Davis has favored me with an essay on Wilde by way of advance notice of his coming. He lavishes on Wilde an almost blubbering pity. "Of what," he cries, "is the intelligent denizen of our pseudo-civilization more ashamed—the pitiful crime of the neurotic Wilde, or the crime of our stolid society against the perverse unfortunate?" 'Tis a difficult question further complicated by the following startling analogy: "If the product of the brain is to be forever associated with the function of the physique, shall we not reject 'Don Juan' because of the congenital lameness of Byron, or shall we deny the dignity of Pope's 'Essay on Man' because he was physically deformed?" Pursuing Wilde's career Davis tells us that in 1884 Wilde married. "That fact," he comments, "is hardly worthy of mentioning, since so many men do that." This note is certainly not clerical and I would hesitate to call it vaudevillainous. It must be a purely esthetic utterance. Davis agrees with Henri de Regnier that Wilde was punished for a chronological error and of Nordau's Degeneration" in which Wilde was branded a degenerate and a pervert he says: "Before I had finished reading it I was convinced that either Nordau was a degenerate and a pervert or that I was." Davis adds that he has "found beauty, brilliance and profundity in the orchidaceous lavishment of Wilde's exotic waste." If Wilde were alive to read that sentence he would shudder to the artistic soul of him. The essay ends with this cryptic utterance: "It is vain for a man to be more nice than God." To any reader who finds meaning in that I will supply a couple of passes when Davis appears at the Orpheum.

A Bit of Bunten Repartee

Colonel Laurie Bunten whose sad death has shocked everybody in town will be particularly mourned in the Bohemian Club because he belonged to a coterie of wits that is scarcely more than a memory now. Wit is not lavished prodigally in the Bohemian Club of today but is doled out carefully as befits a rare and precious commodity. Colonel Bunten's wit was of the stinging variety. Witness his retort to Orrin Peck one day. Good Scot though the colonel was he was brought up in Germany and loved the language. Orrin Peck tried to rally him for speaking German so frequently and put his pleasantry in this form: "Colonel, you don't care for English, do you? I never heard you speak English." To which the colonel replied: "You wouldn't understand me if I did."

Booming the Job-Chasers

Along with the direct primary has come the political press-agent. Every up-to-date candidate with money to burn has a man with a typewriter on his staff whose duty it is to promote publicity. The literary effusions of these press-agents are greatly swelling the volume of business done by the post-office. The job-chasers are buying stamps by wholesale. Every editor in the State has his waste-paper basket choked with communications from the busy boomers of the pee-pul's friends, informing them of the wonderful progress that is being made toward the various goals of worthy ambition, and calling attention to the unsurpassed fitness for office that distinguishes the subject of every eulogium. Nearly all these communications are of the same tone and in the same strain. The only press-agent who has anything to say of his employer that is not precisely what every other press-agent has to say is on Phil Stanton's staff. What appears to strike him as most remarkable about Stanton is his going qualities. He writes of Stanton as though the qualities most needed in the gubernatorial office were those of a cross-country runner. "He is on the go eighteen hours a day," says Stanton's press-agent; "he completely exhausts the other members of his party in an effort to keep up with him." Now from this one might judge that Stanton was merely trying to break a speed record; but according to his eulogist, "His idea is not only to tell the people what he can do for them, but to learn from them the measures in which they are most interested." So with this amiable and benign purpose animating him "he visited fifty counties in twelve weeks covering 8,000 miles." He probably has a speedometer attached to his person, but of this the press-agent says nothing. Suffice it that he is conscientiously touring the State in record time to bring glad tidings to the people and learn of their wants. And he modestly admits, that "the trip has been a great education for him."

Vesta Did Not Respond

Rumor credits Vesta Victoria, the English music hall singer who was in our midst recently, with being one of the wealthiest of stage favorites. She is said to own real estate in London and New York and everybody knows that for a long time she has been enjoying a top-notch salary. In view of this I was very much surprised at a story I heard from a vaudeville performer. Last week a pretty well known vaudeville performer died from tuberculosis in Los Angeles after a considerable period of invalidism. He left his wife only one hundred dollars. Miss Lily Lena was a friend of the couple and as soon as she heard of the husband's death and the wife's plight she despatched one hundred dollars to Los Angeles and called upon all nearby vaudeville performers for ten dollar contributions to a fund for funeral expenses. All the vaudeville performers in San Francisco and contiguous places responded readily—with one exception. Four hundred dollars was raised but in the list of contributors the name of Miss Vesta Victoria was lacking. Miss Victoria simply ignored the appeal.

The Auspices at Carmel

I was unable to make the pilgrimage to Carmel-by-the-Sea last Saturday to witness the maiden presentation in the virgin Forest Theater of Constance Skinner's "David," but I have gathered a circumstantial impression of the event from close study of the dramatic critics. I do not always agree with the dramatic critics but never do I fail to admire their handiwork and my admiration of their treatment of the Carmel amateurs approaches the superlative. In particular do I radiate appreciation of the manner in which Mr. Al Joy of the Examiner sugar-coated his bitter pill of criticism. From Mr. Joy I learn that the Forest Theater is a place of great natural beauty. He pictures for me the towering pines and the somber firs, the stars that peep and the breakers that break in the distance with a musical monotone. I learn that the theater is a poem and that the players deserve credit for their strenuous rehearsals. I read that the stage pictures were beautiful, that the flowing robes were impressive, that the singing and dancing, the flaming of the torches and the smoking of the censers captivated the senses. And then, having assimilated all this praise and being prepared for still more flattering mention of the play and the players, I am brought up with a jerk. I find that Mr. Joy has merely been poking the critical fires and that the roasting is about to begin. I learn that while the theater may be a poem the performance is not a play but "pure claptrap," that its tragedy is comic and its comedy tragic, that the language is stilted, the speeches incongruous and the whole action "absurd melodrama." To cap the climax I am informed that the theme was better treated in a curious production called "The Shepherd King" written and played here some time ago by an actorine named Wright Lorimer. As for the players, Mr. Joy says that only one of them can ever hope to be successful. Knowing Mr. Joy for a conscientious appraiser I am forced to the conclusion—oh, most impotent conclusion!—that the auspices do not favor a dramatic renascence at Carmel. Which is too bad. The Carmelites aimed at the stars and their ambitious missiles were boomerangs. They have a beautiful theater but they are not actors and their play is unactable. But there is one consolation for the Carmelites. None of the critics described Miss Skinner's play as a closet drama. That favorite phrase in the language of damnation by faint praise was not put into requisition. A closet drama is a contradiction of terms used by critics to salve the soreness of failure. It is better for the Carmelites to know that they have failed than to cheat themselves with words that mock. Let them manifest their sporting spirit by giving three times three for the critics.

The Hetch-Hetchy Folly

Engineers appointed by the Federal authorities to ascertain whether San Francisco needs a greater supply of water than is to be obtained from Lake Eleanor will soon be in the field. I am told it is almost certain they will find that there is more water in Lake Eleanor than we shall require, and consequently that nature lovers need not worry over the proposed trespass within the primeval forest of the Hetch-Hetchy Valley. This news causes me to wonder whether in the event of the engineers reporting that Lake Eleanor is all that we need anything will be said about the money (nearly two hundred thousand dollars) which the taxpayers of this city have spent for certain rights in Hetch-Hetchy. While it is of no use to cry over spilt milk it may be to our advantage to reflect on the asininity of the individuals who led us to believe that both the valley and the lake were required to insure us an adequate water supply. It may be to our advantage for the reason that despite the humiliation which this city recently suffered in Washington when the facts were disclosed that we were absolutely without data to support our demands for the permit which Secretary Ballinger had withheld, and had been spending money like drunken sailors for the things which in all probability we may never need, nevertheless we are still indulging the incompetents who brought the humiliation upon us.

A Tale of a Hatter

San Francisco rejoices in the possession of a hatter who is a master of the art of exploitation. When it comes to planning new stunts in advertising you must arise before dawn to get ahead of him. There is no avenue of publicity which he has not traversed. With this hatter advertising is business and business is his greatest pleasure. To his mind heads were made to be fitted with hats and he would rather see one of his hats on the head of a great man than possess his brains. This hatter's specialty in advertising is a picture of heroic size representing the back of his own head with an inscription beneath inviting the stranger to meet him face to face. It is an expressive picture showing all the characteristic brilliance of the hatter's personality and it has won him much trade, for hundreds of the curious go to his shop to discover whether the front of his head is as beautiful as the back. But this is not my story. A few days before the fight Tom Dillon—I cannot conceal his identity—despatched an agent to Reno with instructions to obtain from Tex Rickard permission to erect a small sign at the arena. The agent went out to the arena to select the likeliest place. He found that there was only one advertisement displayed, the familiar Bull Durham sign of the American Tobacco Company. Dillon's agent found Rickard and made his request. "I would like to put Tom's sign just over that Bull Durham advertisement," he explained. "How much would Tom be willing to pay?" queried Tex.

"Pay?" repeated Tom's agent. "He didn't expect to pay; he just wanted to display a little sign, so the boys would remember him when they got back to town." "Do you know how much that Bull Durham sign cost?" asked Tex. Tom's agent shook his head. "It cost Henry Heyneman of the American Tobacco Company just $25,000 and it would have cost $50,000 if the fight had been held in San Francisco." Tom Dillon's agent fainted dead away.

The Newspaper Revel

Disappointed though they may have been in the outcome of the fight the horde of sporting writers who flocked to the Pacific Coast from all parts of the world to report the Jeffries-Johnson affair had the satisfaction of being entertained to the limit in San Francisco. The leading clubs in the city were open to them and their visit was brought to a giddy conclusion on the night of July 6 when they were given a farewell jinks and banquet at The Press Club. This event opened at 6:30 p. m. and continued in whirlwind fashion for nigh 12 hours. Vaudeville talent of every conceivable sort was brought into play, the program including acts by Will Cressy, Agnes Mahr, Peter Donald and Meta Carson, Bunyea and Gideon, La Estrellita, Niel McKinley and Daisy Thorne Lundy. At the dinner preceding the jinks speeches were made by J. Hamilton Fyfe of The London Mail, William Corbett, a sporting writer of Sydney, Hugh E. Keough of the Chicago Tribune, H. G. Foster of the New York Telegraph, Hugh McKintosh, the Australian promoter, Bob Fitzsimmons, Tommy Burns and Battling Nelson. W. W. Naughton of the San Francisco Examiner sired the jinks. The affair throughout was a unique one, the early evening being devoted to an Oriental jinks, arranged by Carl Schiller, at which Chinese performers and musicians banged and squeaked themselves into a state of Chinese bliss. The occidental jinks began at midnight when the actors playing the local houses added themselves to the joyous aggregation of writers and fighters.

Lady Douglas' Plight

So Lady Sholto Douglas has attempted suicide after leaving a Salvation Army shelter in Spokane. Strange indeed has been the career of this once beautiful woman. How many know that it was the dullness of Bakersfield which raised Loretta Mooney, the daughter of a San Francisco policeman to the British peerage? The story is that while Lord Sholto Douglas was sojourning with some English friends at a ranch near the oil town he became bored to death and decided to sample the delights offered by Bakersfield's tenderloin. At a dance hall he met Miss Loretta Addis, as she called herself, fell in love with her and later persuaded her to become his wife. It was therefore Lord Sholto's desire to find relief from ennui that led to one of the most surprising of international alliances. Several years ago news came from Spokane where Lady Douglas recently tried to commit suicide that Lord Sholto had purchased a saloon for $1700 and proposed to settle down and lead a quiet life. At that time he was supposed to have $50,000 of his inheritance but he must have dissipated it very quickly for a year later his wife returned to the footlights as an actress and her salary was supposed to be the sole support of the family. Sholto Douglas is the third son of the old Marquis of Queensbury whose name is associated with pugilism and with the Wilde debacle. He is a brother of Lord Alfred Douglas who, after being exposed to the world as Wilde's pathic, married a poetess and became the editor of the London Academy, a position in which he now lashes vice with the fanaticism of a devotee.

A Soldier-Dramatist Dead

Those of us who had the good fortune to see Miss Annie Russel and Lawrence D'Orsay in "A Royal Family" and John Drew in "The Second in Command" and "The Duke of Killiecrankie" learned with extreme regret of the recent death of Captain Robert Marshall, the author of these and other good plays. Captain Marshall was born in Edinburgh in 1863. He served with distinction in South Africa and elsewhere and retired from the army in 1903. A good many years before that he had commenced play-writing and continued it with noteworthy success up to the time of his death. Aside from the three dramas already mentioned the piece of his which was best known to Americans was "His Excellency the Governor" in which Ethel Barrymore appeared. All of his plays were noted for the sparkle of their dialogue and the daintiness of their situations.

Sacramento and Irrigation

Another great irrigation project is under way in the Sacramento Valley. To the great work being done on the Haggin Grant subdivision and the Natomas reclamation scheme will soon be added the project of the California Corporation which will place under irrigation, cut up and sell a tract of 100,000 acres in the southern part of Sacramento County in the vicinity of Galt. This enterprise is being undertaken by Sacramento capitalists who have completed their preliminary work and will soon be ready to turn water into the lands which they control. They own what was formerly the North Fork Ditch Company which irrigates the rich Fair Oaks lands and have purchased the property of the Woodbridge Canal Company which supplies water to more than five thousand acres. The land to be placed under cultivation will be suitable for vine and deciduous fruit culture as well as for dairy farming. In consequence of this latest project there will soon be 224,000 acres bordering on the muncipal boundaries of Sacramento ready for subdivision into small farms. The addition to the wealth of the county will be enormous.

The Wonders We are Working

The ordinary San Franciscan knows practically nothing about the wonders which irrigation and reclamation are working in the northern half of California. Outsiders are much better posted than we are. For instance, there is now in San Joaquin County a St. Petersburg scientist who is famed in Russia for his knowledge of agriculture and engineering and who was sent out here to study the irrigation and reclamation projects which are being carried out by great combinations of capital. Before that Russian leaves Stockton and the vicinity he will learn a great deal about the subjects which he is investigating, for he is the guest of the Rindge Syndicate which has about 25,000 acres of reclaimed land in the river district. The papers of the Sacramento Valley towns are constantly recording the inception of new irrigation and reclamation projects. The whole valley is buzzing with progress and humming with machinery. As fast as the engineer prepares the land by draining or irrigating it the scientific farmer or orchardist commences to cultivate it, with the result that the land values of the section are climbing upward by mighty leaps. And yet, as I have said, we know almost nothing of these things in San Francisco. I venture to say that investors in London are better posted on the affairs of Natomas Consolidated, to mention one great corporation, than are the ordinary investors of this city. We live in the midst of thaumaturges and seem to regard their wonders with indifference.

The Fascinating Mrs. Oelrichs

What a procession would be without a band is nothing to what Newport would be without San Francisco's foremost representative, that blithe and buxom widow Mrs. Hermann Oelrichs. Perennially productive of sensations that alleviate monotony, an inexhaustible source of cordials against consumption of the spirit, old Jim Fair's rich and rollicking daughter supplies most of the oil that keeps the rust off life in gay and giddy Newport. She is always figuring in some episode that excites the interest of the blase bavardes. The news of her doings is always salt for the conversation of the elect. Gossip was becoming very tame in Newport when Mrs. Oelrichs sprang the sensation about the coachman who fell in love with her, and who while fainting for the inspiriting atmosphere of her affections gave some measure of relief to his impassioned soul in letters of somewhat sapphic torridity. And now the gossips of Newport are observing that this was not the first coachman by whom Mrs. Oelrichs has been worshiped. Incidentally we are told that Mrs. Oelrichs has grown so attractive that because of the number of her admirers she is like the old woman who lived in the shoe. Among them according to Newport gossip are Harry Lehr, Harry Black, Addison Mizner and Stuyve Le Roy.

Newport's Jester

The report that Harry Lehr is one of Mrs. Oelrichs' admirers may be regarded as somewhat shocking; for Harry is a married man, and the supposition is that between Newporters marriage is like the Constitution between friends. But to one versed in the manners of Newport and cognizant of its personalities, their predilections and pastimes, this report is not of the slightest significance. Harry Lehr is the all-round queen's jester of Newport. He plays no favorites. He capers nimbly from court to court making milady smile, embroidering conversation with pungent witticisms, putting touches of rosy sunsets in lives that are gilded but not all gladness. When he was not a married man he entertained married ladies. Why, now that he is married, should he confine his enlivening attentions to single ones? Before his marriage he was unremitting in his intimate ministrations to that frothy triumvirate of the smart set comprising Mrs. "Ollie" Belmont, Mrs. Stuyve Fish and Mrs. Oelrichs and by everybody it was understood that the office he filled was that of promoter of social gaiety. Habituated to that office he has never quite vacated it. Doubtless he still admires Mrs. Oelrichs, but that does not mean that he loves her. And as for Addison Mizner, the jester imported from this city, of course the admiration that he has for Mrs. Oelrichs is only such as her intellectual qualities excite. Addison knows no emotions save those that spring from the intellect. The fact is that Mrs. Oelrichs has but one wooer, and that one is Harry Black who has decided, now that she has postponed her trip to Europe, to postpone his also.

Ada Ryland's Romance

By the death of Miss Ada Ryland, the eldest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. C. T. Ryland of San Jose, a lifelong romance has been brought to light. The publication of Miss Ryland's will showed that she cherished through life an attachment of the strongest sort which never ended in marriage owing first to a promise given to her mother and in the second place to her untimely death. The late Mrs. C. T. Ryland, it will be remembered, was a member of the old banking firm of McLaughlin and Ryland. By birth she was Letitia Burnett, the daughter of the State's first governor. Her sister married the late Judge Wallace. Her daughter Ada Ryland fell in love years ago with Mr. Finley of San Jose and engaged herself to him without her mother's consent. When Mrs. Ryland learned of the romance she made emphatic objection because the two were first cousins. The mother of Mr. Finley was a sister of C. T. Ryland. Mrs. Ryland exacted a promise from her daughter that she would not marry Mr. Finley in her mother's life time. Miss Ryland was a beautiful and cultured girl but she never forgot her first love. Her mother died about six weeks ago, leaving her all her estate including the beautiful Ryland home. Worn out with nursing her mother Miss Ryland went to Denver to visit her sister Mrs. Erby and three weeks after her arrival died of pneumonia. It then came to light that she was on the eve of marrying Mr. Finley. Her mother's death freed her from her promise but death stepped between the lovers. Miss Ryland willed everything to the man who had waited so long and who would have been her husband if she had lived.

A Letter from a Prude

I have just received the following letter:

San Francisco, July 11, 1910.

Dear Tantalus:

It is unnecessary for me to give names or place but I assure you that the following is an accurate report of a conversation which I happened to overhear a few days ago. The speakers were two prominent society women. "Won't you come with me," said one, "and have luncheon at the Palace?" "Thank you very much," answered the other, "but I must go home. Why don't you go home with me for luncheon?" "Really," said the first speaker, "the Palace is so much more convenient. Why must you go home?" "To tell you the truth," explained the other, "I must have a smoke after luncheon and my people would be horrified if I smoked in public. It has become so with me that I must have my smoke after each meal." What I want to ask, dear Tantalus, is just this—what do you think society is coming to when one of its prominent women is not ashamed to talk like that?

Very sincerely,

—A Prude.

Dear correspondent, you need not have concealed your identity under the noun which you signed to this letter. I would have known that you were a prude from the contents. Only prudes overhear conversations which were not meant for their ears, or to put it in another way, only prudes repeat such conversations. I am surprised at your medieval scruples. Why should not this good woman smoke at luncheon or at any other time if she sees fit? Is there a commandment against smoking in the Decalogue? Do you seriously think that St. Peter ever barred the gate of Paradise to any woman merely because she liked the weed? Or do you pretend to think that Mr. Greenway ever excluded a woman from his assemblies because there was a trace of nicotine on her pretty fingers? Well then, if one can smoke and still go to the Greenways while one lives and to Heaven when one dies, what in the name of morality and society can be your objection to the cigarette?

The Versatile Mizners

Not long ago Lansing Mizner who is the single member of his spectacular family flourishing in comparative obscurity, was seen to pick up a newspaper in the reading room of the Bohemian Club and scan the pages carefully. Then he put it down with a sigh of relief. "Nothing about a Mizner today," he murmured and turned his attention to other things. "Looking for something?" asked a friend. "No," was the reply, "not exactly, but I instinctively search the columns every day for some sensational yarn about a Mizner and the days I don't find one are red letter days." The incident occurred to me when I read that Addison Mizner had been intrusted with the care of the Gould children by their mother when she departed on her Thomas wedding trip. "Addie" was not a conspicuous success as guardian since he permitted Miss Helen Gould's detective to secure his young charges. Until Wilson Mizner appeared in Reno for the fight there had been a slump in the family notoriety which must have been grateful to the retiring Lansing.

Mrs. Kohl at Tahoe

Mrs. Fred Kohl has stood an unmerciful lot of jollying the past week because a newspaper despatch referred to her as "proprietress of a resort on Lake Tahoe." She was assuredly not responsible for the ignorance of a correspondent who thought "Idlewild" was something between a summer hotel and a picnic park, but since the article appeared her friends have deluged "Mrs. Kohl, Proprietress of Idlewild" with letters requesting accommodations for families. The news item was anent the drowning of Captain Howard of the Kohl's yacht "Idlewild" and it was at the inquest that testimony is reported as given by "Mrs. Kohl, proprietress of the resort," who ran the yacht, presumably for the hire of patrons of the resort. It was a good "ad" wasted. "Idlewild" is one of the most beautiful estates in the Tahoe region, formerly the property of Amy Ashe Gillig Gouraud who gave it its name. Since the Kohls acquired it they have entirely rebuilt the home and added a score of guest rooms and during the summer they entertain relays of visitors. Among their August guests will be Mrs. Jack Casserly who is one of Mrs. Kohl's intimates, their mutual love of music bringing them much together. Recently Mrs. Kohl has sung at several affairs to the harp accompaniment of Mrs. Casserly and the result has moved their friends to enthusiasm. Even Walter Damrosch who heard them at the Casserly home in San Mateo expressed his delight.

The Success of Gladys Unger

From Charles Frohman's Bulletin I learn with considerable interest that Gladys Unger, a San Francisco girl who has spent most of her life in Paris and London, is engaged in translating "Le Bois Sacre" (The Sacred Grove), a play by Robert de Flers and Armand Caillavet which achieved a great success in Paris. It is to be the starring vehicle this fall for Hattie Williams and G. P. Huntley. Miss Unger is certainly making her mark in the dramatic field. It was she who translated from the French of de Flers and Caillavet "Love Watches" in which Billie Burke starred, "Inconstant George" which John Drew presented with some success and "My Wife" in which Mr. Drew and Miss Burke made an unusual hit. Miss Unger's work is not the mere drudgery of translation. All the French plays which are used on the American stage must be more or less twisted out of their original shape to suit our peculiar ideas and in this work Miss Unger has been singularly successful. Gladys Unger is the daughter of Frank Unger but is not very well known here owing to her continued residence on the other side of the pond. For a long time she was under the protection of Mrs. Charles T. Yerkes, afterwards Mrs. Wilson Mizner, and enjoyed the best advantages of Parisian and London education. She early manifested great artistic ability and first won success as a dramatist with a curtain raiser which received the approval of Seymour Hicks, the well known London actor-manager. For some time now she has been living in Essex.

Her Clever Parents

Gladys Unger comes naturally by her talents. Her father Frank Unger used to belong to a brilliant coterie of Bohemian clubmen which included Harry Gillig, Billy Barton and Dan O'Connell. He is as versatile as his friend Joe Redding and can talk, write, dance and sing with equal distinction. He plies the brush and the crayon with success and as an amateur actor has won applause both at the Bohemian and the Lambs club. Gladys Unger's mother was Minnie California Buchanan. After her divorce from Frank Unger she married Arthur Jules Goodman, the artist, but the second marriage had a termination like the first. At the time that Minnie Buchanan graduated from Mills Seminary she was known to possess artistic and literary ability. She was fascinating and popular and possessed a fortune of fifty or sixty thousand dollars. She led the germans of the fashionable Southern set with Frank Unger and their mutual infatuation ended in marriage. When Frank had dissipated her fortune she separated from him and supported herself by contributing to a couple of evanescent weeklies in this city. Later she went to Paris and met the delightful Arthur Jules Goodman who took quite an interest in her and her little girl Gladys. He followed her to New York and there they were married. They collaborated, Arthur Jules illustrating his wife's magazine work and then went back to Paris where, as Mrs. Goodman put it, "For ten years Artie held my hand while I gave every thought to furthering his interests." Fnally they separated and Mrs. Goodman devoted herself to her daughter whose genius was beginning to loom on the horizon. It was shortly afterwards that Gladys Unger's curtain raiser "Edmund Kean" received the approbation of Seymour Hicks. Ever since then her work has borne the hall-mark of success. Her mother I think, is with her in Essex.

G. H. Swift and a party of four of the well-known Chicago family, arrived at the Potter in Santa Barbara recently from Los Angeles by automobile. They will remain several weeks.

Their Old-Fashioned Devotion

I was down at the Hotel Potter in Santa Barbara a few days ago and was very much amused by some of the criticism which is being leveled at Mr. Templeton Crocker and his beautiful betrothed Miss Helene Irwin. Ever since Mr. Crocker arrived there in his private car with his bride-to-be, her mother and Miss Julia Langhorne, his movements have been the principal, nay the only study of a number of sojourners whose position in society is more or less fixed. The criticisms of these observers bear very severely on Mr. Crocker and Miss Irwin. It is not any lack of devotion that is carped at —far from it. The critics are very frank in expressing the opinion that the engaged couple are altogether too fond of each other and have no shame about manifesting their affection in public. This criticism greatly surprised me and I sought an elucidation. I then discovered that in the social circle which the critics adorn devotion between an engaged couple is regarded as old-fashioned. It is not considered as bourgeois as love between husband and wife, but the critics say that it is in thoroughly bad taste, particularly when it is allowed to be seen by the vulgar eye. They pointed out to me several other engaged couples who treated each other in the approved manner of smart society. As nearly as I can describe that manner it seems to be a mixture of hauteur and contempt set off by occasional flashes of bored recognition. "Marriages nowadays," said one of my informants, "are of such doubful duration that the contracting parties are bound for their own peace of mind to curb any natural tendency toward affection. The memory of the impulsive lovemaking of other days frequently dashes the happiness of the divorced state. So why take any chances?" All this set me thinking and observing. I finally reached the conclusion that while some of the other engaged couples who came under my notice may regard matrimony as a way station en route to divorce, no such thought enters the happy heads of Mr. Crocker and Miss Irwin and I rejoiced in their old-fashioned fondness.

The Interesting Ives Family

Those who have watched the big touring car standing almost constantly at the door of the Ives home in Washington street were not surprised at the announcement of the engagement of Florence Ives to Othello Scribner. Miss Ives is the daughter of Mrs. Eunice Jane Ives and the sister of Mrs. Henry J. Crocker and Mrs. McLaine. W. S. Ives of Sacramento is her brother. The Ives family came into prominence many years ago when the late Mrs. Charles McLaughlin adopted little May Ives. She reared and educated the pretty girl and lavished every luxury upon her that wealth could procure. May Ives is now Mrs. Henry J. Crocker, one of the most beautiful and most interesting women in society. When Mrs. McLaughlin died without children she left her fortune to Mrs. Crocker. Miss Florence Ives and Kate May Dillon, her niece, who is now Mrs. Emory Winship. After her marriage Mrs. Crocker built the quaint little home in Washington street next to her own residence and installed there her mother and wamily.

Sports at Del Monte

The official announcement of the dates for the annual month of sports at Hotel Del Monte has just been issued. This year's games will open on August 19 with the Del Monte golf tournament which will continue until the twenty-sixth. The tenth annual competition for the men's amateur championship of the Pacific Coast Golf Association will be held from August 27 to August 31, inclusive. The men's open championship of the Pacific Coast will be played off on August 28. The Pacific Coast Golf Association is composed of the golf clubs of Los Angeles, Redlands, Riverside, San Diego, Santa Barbara, San Francisco, Oakland, Sacramento, Portland, Tacoma, Seattle, Spokane, Victoria and Vancouver. Each of these clubs sends a team to compete for the honors.

Del Monte links are the scene of the play because they are strictly neutral ground. The men's open championship for the Pacific Coast is open to all players, and the winner holds the championship cup for a year. The tennis tournament will be given during the holiday week of the Labor day and Admission day celebration and will doubtless bring a large crowd of tennis enthusiasts. This is the annual event for the championship of the Pacific Coast and the interest in it is coast-wide. In addition to the regular events for the more skilled players, a number of other classes have been provided, enabling every one to play whether highly skilled or very amateurish in the game. The prizes, cups and trophies hung up at Del Monte during the month of sports are always worth trying for and this year the number of them has been greatly increased. As usual the reduced railroad fare will be arranged from all points in the State.

Fairmont Hotel Innovation

Not content with giving to San Francisco two of the most magnificent hotels in the world operated on the European plan, the Palace Hotel Company has gone a step further and now announces that on and after September 1 it will operate an American plan as well as the European plan dining room at the Fairmont Hotel. For several years before the fire the Palace Hotel maintained both the table d'hote and a la carte dining rooms. Since that time however the European plan only has been in force and San Francisco has been without a really first class American plan house. That a hotel operated on the table d'hote plan was really needed however has been proved to the management of the Fairmont by the number of requests for this service by local residents and also by the travelers who assemble at that fashionable hostelry. This demand is particularly strong with the travelers from the Orient and the islands where the table d'hote plan is universally accepted. As the Fairmont caters almost entirely to this highest class of travel such a demand could not be ignored and the present announcement is the result. The introduction of the table d'hote plan will not affect the operation of the European plan which will be maintained as heretofore.

In the Social Spotlight

Castle Crags continues to be a favorite resort for vacationists. One of the reasons for this is the freedom from formality in dress. One may wear "country clothes" at Castle Crags. Among the guests summering there are: Joseph L. Barber of Portland, Mrs. J. C. Plunkett of Oakland, Dr. and Mrs. R. B. Williams of Sausalito, Mr. and Mrs. B. A. Woodford and Mr. and Mrs. A. R. Harwood of Claremont, Mr. and Mrs. Anson Herrick, Mr. and Mrs. G. A. Dow, Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Morton, all of this city, Dr. and Mrs. W. V. Cook and Mr. Carson Cook of Pasadena, Mr. J. S. Merrill and Mr. Francis Merrill of Menlo Park, Mrs. N. J. Tiffany of Sausalito, Miss Clara Dabney of Oakland, Mr. and Mrs. W. J. L. Kierulff of San Francisco, Mrs. M. D. Eaton, Miss Selma Eaton and Mr. Ralph Eaton of Stockton, Mr. and Mrs. G. R. Frederick, Miss W. Jackson, Mr. and Mrs. A. J. Chapman, Mr. and Mrs. W. Bogart, Mrs. Jonathan Swigert, Mrs. James A. Snook, Dr. and Mrs. J. Wilson Shields, Mr. and Mrs. A. E. Anderson, G. W. Hendry, Mrs. A. Hendry, C. S. Wheeler, Miss Isabel McPherson, Bruce Fair, all of this city. Dancing, swimming, riding and bridge are some of the diversions to which these guests are devoting themselves.

Miss E. B. Wymans arrived here recently from Nice, France, and registered at the Hotel Victoria.

Mrs. F. M. Miller and daughter of Fresno are spending the summer months at the Victoria.

Mrs. Victor Blue has returned to the Victoria after an absence of six weeks spent at Mare Island.

Mr. and Mrs. Jas. W. Garneau and three daughters of St. Louis are spending the summer months at the Victoria.

E. C. Crystal, a business man of Vacaville, is spending a few days at the Victoria.

Mr. and Mrs. C. B. Woodruff and sister, Mrs. Hepburn of Sacramento, are spending a few days at the Victoria.

Mrs. Andrew P. Welch and her charming young daughters, the Misses Marie and Florence, have gone from their home at San Mateo, and will spend the summer months at the Potter Hotel. Mr. Welch is motoring down the coast and will joint his family at the hotel. It is the third summer that this fashionable family have been guests of the Potter, but in the past they have never arrived there until after July, spending the present month at Lake Tahoe. As so many San Francisco society people have selected Santa Barbara this year as the best summer watering place on the coast, the customary outing at the beautiful lake resort in the Sierras was not taken. Each day the San Francisco colony (which includes the society people of San Mateo, Burlingame, Oakland, San Rafael and other fashionable suburbs around the bay) is growing larger at the Potter Hotel. With the Welchs there and the Porters, Newhalls and others to follow, it looks as though Santa Barbara will have the cream of northern society within its gates.

Roy Wheeler, one of the most popular and congenial club and society men of Pasadena, was at the Palace for several days during the week, having motored up in his touring car to meet Rev. and Mrs. Robert Burdette of Pasadena who returned from a trip to the Orient. The trio remained at the Palace in one of the royal suites for a few days before motoring down to the southland.

Mrs. Wm. L. Hathaway and daughters, Marie and Mabel, of San Francisco were the guests of Mrs. H. H. McGowan of Paraiso Hot Springs for the week end. Miss Hatton of Monterey accompanied the party.

Mrs. D. K. Champlain was a luncheon hostess at the Fairmont Monday, entertaining a group of eight ladies. The table was beautifully attractive in long stemmed American Beauty roses.

Paymaster and Mrs. G. H. Douglas of the United States Navy are guests at the Fairmont and have been informally entertained during their stay by members of the service set.

A private masquerade was given at Paraiso Hot Springs on Tuesday last. All the guests participated and the affair was very successful. Dancing and supper concluded the evening's enjoyment.

Mr. and Mrs. Samuel T. Wagner of Philadelphia are among the prominent eastern persons of social prominence who stopped at the Fairmont during the week. Mr. and Mrs. Wagner will spend several weeks at Del Monte and will return later to the Fairmont.

Mrs. T. C. McCauley was another of the delightful hostesses at luncheon at the Fairmont this week. Her guests numbered four.

One of the prettiest and smartest luncheon parties of the week was given at the Palace by Miss Curran who motored in from the country on Monday. The table was beautifully decked with roses and ferns. The guests included Mrs. Clem Tobin, Mrs. Worthington Ames, Mrs. Rooney, Miss Cooke, Miss Lily O'Connor and Miss Frances Stewart.

Among the prominent society people from Los Angeles who stopped at the Palace during the week were Mr. and Mrs. Sherley C. Ward, Mr. and Mrs. E. T. Stimson, the latter being accompanied by Mrs. T. J. Waters and Miss M. E. Spencer, Mr. and Mrs. Guy B. Barham, Mr. and Mrs. L. J. Burford and Dr. and Mrs. T. D. Fairchild.

Recent San Francisco arrivals at Hotel del Coronado included Frank I. Towle, C. W. Berry, Mr. and Mrs. E. S. Andrews, Mr. and Mrs. P. N. Gordon, P. M. Moise, Miss Hazel Moise, Miss Clarice Moise, Mr. and Mrs. M. P. O'Reilly and child, Mr. and Mrs. E. G. Doyle, A. G. Galt, Miss Lillian Deacon, T. G. McMahon, Mrs. J. M. Hewitt and Miss J. Armer.

Mrs. Cuyler Lee who with her family is spending the season at Del Monte entertained half a dozen of her friends at tea at Pebble Beach Lodge last Wednesday. Friday Mrs. Lee gave a very elaborate little tea for her friends who are guests at Del Monte.

Hackett in Bernstein's "Samson"

By Edward F. O'Day

Is Marseilles the Keokuk of Europe? Are its husky longshoremen the hoosiers of France? Was Maurice Brachard self-made in the Marseilles of southern France or in the Marseilles of northern Illinois? Twenty-four hours after seeing James K. Hackett in Bernstein's "Samson" I am still in doubt about these questions of geography. Hackett plays the part of the money king of Paris but he suggests a corn baron of Indiana. He is about as Frenchy as John D. Rockefeller. His clothes look as though they were borrowed from "The Man from Home." His manners are Chicagoese. In short he acts like an American captain of industry transported to Paris. If the scene were laid in the stock yards or Wall street the illusion would be complete. As it is the illusion limps. Bernstein did not make his malefactor of great wealth on the American pattern. Far from it. There are no Brachards in Bradstreet's list. No American Samson would be so blind to the methods of modern business as to pull down the temple of Mammon on his own toupee. Yet that is what Maurice Brachard does. He wipes out his own fortune of thirty million francs to break the man who had designs on his wife. We do these things better in America. Rumor has it that John D. Rockefeller and Andrew Carnegie have broken many a man but never have they had to imperil their own fortunes in the process. In Paris, it would seem, millionaires of the self-made variety are more quixotic. They toss fortunes to the winds and stride to the embraces of marital reconciliation over the prostrate forms of their foes. This is melodramatic and therefore interesting to the general, but it is not American. Then why, oh why should James K. Hackett play Maurice Brachard like an American of the middle west? For the life of me I cannot find a satisfactory answer to this question. It may be that Hackett deliberately plays the role after the fashion most likely to please the multitude. The multitude has had an abundance of plays dealing with heavy handed pork packers, stock brokers and other varieties of millionaire and there can be no doubt that the multitude likes these plays. Is it possible that Hackett has decided to save the multitude the trouble of making the acquaintance of a new type? that he has calmly reduced Maurice Brachard, self-made in Marseilles and Paris, to the common denominator of Americans self-made in Keokuk and Chicago or Akron and New York? It would seem so and I am sorry for it. Otis Skinner or William Gillette would not have treated the part so. It is a splendid part and worthy of better handling. And the play is a splendid play, full of thrills, rather talky in the first act but continuously entertaining. How the audience, that dear old Alcazar audience that is a mixture of sophistication, semi-sophistication, pseudo-sophistication and wide-eyed girlish ingenuousness, how it did drink in the racy details of Parisian high life! You could have heard a pin drop while Jerome was making his assignation with Anne-Marie or while Elsie was describing the orgy at the Cafe de Paris. Too bad that the players were not all equal to their tasks. Hackett himself had moments of great intensity but they were too often succeeded by grimacing, arm-swinging pantomime which was neither dramatic nor French. Arthur Hoops, Hackett's leading man, carries his arms like a suspicious prizefighter and his neck like a man with a boil. His was a splendid part—in fact all the parts are splendid—but he insisted on caricaturing it for the sake of evoking laughter. If Jerome Le Govain had acted like Arthur Hoops he would never have been what the program says he was, "a great favorite in Parisian society." Charles Gunn acts well enough but his pronunciation is bad. I can see Fred Butler taking him in hand. Miss Beatrice Beckley is Hackett's leading woman but in "Samson" her part was too much for her. It is a part of unusual emotional demands and should have been entrusted to a more mature actress. Miss Beckley has not passed the sweet young-womanly age of acting yet and it is too much to ask that she do justice to a married woman who has resolved deliberately to be unfaithful to her husband. The same criticism applies to Miss Margaret Calhoun who played Elsie Vernette. Elsie is an incredibly fast young woman who tells a shocking story of dissipation. Now I defy anybody to imagine Miss Margaret Calhoun as participant in an orgy at the Cafe de Paris or anywhere else. Her acting fails utterly to convey the illusion of her lines. She looks like a Puritan. Older women are needed for cynical roles like these. Or if they are to be given to young women, let it be to such as Louise Brownell. I remember her fine portrayal of The Firefly. She is an exceptional young actress. Her part in "Samson" was inconsiderable.It is a pleasure to say that the two members of the cast who played their parts to the satisfaction of the most critical were old favorites at the Alcazar, Bert Wesner and Will Walling. Both of these are exceptional actors and they were delightful in "Samson." Wesner had the better role of the two, that of a bibulous marquis. He was as true to the character in acting as in makeup. Walling's role was an unimportant one but his makeup was wonderful. Take it all in all, "Samson" was very interesting but not the play with which to try the abilities of the Hackett company. It was too much for most of them.

"Seven Days" which has been running at the Astor Theater, New York, for some months past, will be seen here next month. It is said to be provocative of much laughter and is accounted a hit of exceptional note

Among the stars for the coming season at the Columbia are Rose Stahl, Francis Starr, Lillian Russell and Ethel Barrymore.

Miss Crosman in "Anti-Matrimony"

Henrietta Crosman comes to the Columbia Theater for an engagement of two weeks commencing next Monday evening, July 18, in her big comedy success, "Anti-Matrimony." Miss Crosman who has long been recognized as a great comedienne has not been seen in San Francisco in three years, and her return is a matter of great interest to those playgoers who appreciate the very best in modern comedy. She brings a play by Percy MacKaye, poet and dramatist. This play is called "Anti-Matrimony" and is a whimsical, satirical comedy, throwing a humorous light on several angles of the marriage state and poking innocent fun at the misdirected efforts of extreme reformers of domestic conditions. The poignant wit and satire which Mr. MacKaye has infused into his play have won the praise of critics and audiences. Henrietta Crosman has appeared in some splendid comedies and caused much laughter in her various plays, but "Anti-Matrimony" is said to show her at her best. In the role of Mildred Grey, the wholesome, merry-hearted wife of a New England minister who finds the family peace threatened by a scandal and sets her wits to work to bring order out of chaos, Miss Crosman finds a character worthy of her skill, while the other roles in the play are excellently portrayed by one of those faultless companies Miss Crosman always has in her support.

Hackett in "Monsieur Beaucaire"

James K. Hackett, famed as the beau ideal of romantic acting, will find striking opportunity to display his manly graces in "Monsieur Beaucaire," the play selected for his second week at the Alcazar, commencing next Monday evening. It was adapted by Booth Tarkington and Evelyn Greenleaf Sutherland from a French story, and the late Richard Mansfield found it one of his most successful vehicles. It is his version that Mr. Hackett, the only American actor qualified to do it justice, has adopted. It is needless to say that in the costumes of the period Mr. Hackett will be a splendid figure, or that he will fill to utmost the acting requirements of the title role. In the cast with him will be Miss Beatrice Beckley as Lady Mary, Arthur Hoops as the Duke of Winterset, Will R. Walling as Major Molyneaux, Catherine Calhoun as Lucy and the remainder of the Alcazar players in appropriate roles. The production throughout will be one of the most resplendent ever seen on the Alcazar stage, with the glamor of Bath society in the days of Beau Nash reproduced as faithfully as stage art and lavish pecuniary outlay can accomplish.

Izetta Jewel at Ye Liberty

Next Monday evening Miss Izetta Jewel commences her special season of six weeks with the Bishop players at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, when she will appear in the title role of "Merely Mary Ann." Until this last season, Miss Jewel had appeared as leading lady with various stock companies on the Pacific Coast, and with such success that the beginning of the season just passed found her in New York City, playing the leading role with Otis Skinner in "Your Humble Servant." Her success there, as well as in each of the cities visited by Mr. Skinner, is now a matter of theatrical history, but as she does not join him again until the latter part of September Manager Bishop was able to secure her services for a short engagement with his stock company. "Mary Ann" is a character in which Miss Jewel is said to have scored one of her greatest stock hits, and there are doubtless a great number of her former admirers on both sides of the bay who will be glad of this opportunity to renew their acquaintance with her. All of Ye Liberty favorites will be happily cast in the play and it will be given the usual careful scenic surroundings. After one week of the Zangwill comedy Miss Jewel will be seen as "Cigarette" in "Under Two Flags."

A Good Orpheum Bill

The Orpheum bill next week will be headed by Edwards Davis and his company in his own dramatization of Oscar Wilde's "The Picture of Dorian Gray." Mr. Davis was formerly a clergyman and for four years was pastor of the Central Church, Oakland. James Thornton will appear in a series of his newest songs and timely sayings. A new military act, "The Imperial Musicians," will be presented for the first time here next week. It is the work of the celebrated producer Jesse L. Lasky. The company consists of eleven soloists, each of whom is a qualified exponent of his or her instrument. Professor Apdale's trained animals will introduce a "Zoo Circus" which includes dogs, monkeys, cats, ponies and a little brown bear called Jess. Next week will be the last of Pringle and Whiting, Fanny Rice, Signor Travato and Marion Murray & Co. in "The Prima Donna's Honeymoon."

"Faust" will be the opera presented during the entire first week. The opening will be tomorrow (Sunday) when matinee and evening performances will be given. The tuneful "Martha" will be sung on Sunday, Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday of the second week and "Rigoletto" on Thursday, Friday and Saturday. Weber's prize band continues to entertain the lovers of outdoor band music. The critics and public have nothing but praise for his organization and during the remaining three weeks of their stay at the big amusement resort they should play to capacity crowds.

The Orpheum's European Deal

News come from London that Morris Meyerfeld, president, and Martin Beck, general manager of the Orpheum Circuit, have recently consummated probably the most important deal in the history of vaudeville and one that will be far reaching in its effects. Messrs. Meyerfeld and Beck have just concluded with the recently formed Variety Theaters Controlling Company whose headquarters is at Randvoll House, Charing-Cross Road, and of which Alfred Butt is the Chairman and Walter Gibbons and Walter De Frece, members of the Board of Directors, negotiations for the affiliation of the Orpheum Circuit with it. The properties acquired by the Variety Theaters Controlling Company include the well known Barrasford Circuit and also the booking arrangements in connection with the celebrated De Frece Circuit and the London Theaters of Variety (Limited). In addition to this the company has secured the Alhambra, Paris. Messrs. Meyerfeld and Beck are also associated with the Variety Theaters Controlling Company in the construction and equipment of a first class vaudeville theater in Berlin. The advantages which will be derived from the new state of affairs by vaudeville artists and the public are almost incalculable and will result in causing the Orpheum Circuit to be the most powerful organization of its kind in the world. By next year when the Berlin Theater is ready for occupation it will be possible for the Orpheum to give artists a month's engagement in Berlin, a month in Paris, a month at the Palace, London, a subsequent tour of the English provinces and thereafter to send them across the Atlantic to make the Orpheum Circuit tour from New York to San Francisco. The effect of this lengthy engagement will result in the eagerness of the most famous vaudeville stars to engage with the Orpheum management, and consequently the programs will reach the highest possible standard attainable and the amusement public will consequently be great gainers. The news of this remarkable deal caused quite a sensation in London and enabled Messrs. Meyerfeld and Beck to sign quite a number of the foremost vaudeville artists, among whom are several feminine stars of equal celebrity to Vesta Victoria. Among the British Music Halls with which the Orpheum is now affiliated are: Palace Theater, London; The Victoria Palace, London; Alhambra Theater, Paris; Alhambra Theater, Glasgow; Hippodrome, Liverpool, England; Hippodrome, Brighton, England; Hippodrome, Leeds, England, Hippodrome, Hull, England; Hippodrome, Birmingham, England; Hippodrome, Portsmouth, England; Hippodrome, Bedminster, England; Hippodrome, South End, England; Hippodrome, Margate, England; Hippodrome, Boscombe, England; Hippodrome, Southampton, England; Hippodrome, Sheffield, England; Hippodrome, Colchester, England; Hippodrome, Bolton, England; Hippodrome, St. Helens, England; Hippodrome, Nottingham, England; Hippodrome, Blackburn, England; Pavilion, Newcastle-on-Tyne, England; Palace, Manchester, England; Empire, Wolverhampton, England; Opera House, Tunbridge Wells, England; The Grand, Bristol, England; The Empire, Aberdeen, Scotland.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—The past week in stocks has been a very trying one on the trader, stocks rising one day only to fall again the next. The Inter-State Commerce Commission by its action in the Nevada rate cases has upset everything, inasmuch as it was confidently believed by the best posted people that the railroads would be allowed to increase their rates, and the action of the Commission would indicate that a reduction in some classified rates was in order rather than an increase. Sentiment turned very bearish on the theory that without an increase in freight rates dividends would have to be cut, and it was rumored that St. Paul and Atchison which held their dividend meetings last week would be the first to cut. The action of the directors of both companies in declaring the regular dividend was a big market factor and had a good effect upon the general list. The market recovered most of its loss and at the end of the week is in a fair position for a further advance as sentiment has again become more optimistic. There is however so much hanging over the market that a good rally is about all that can be looked for at present.

Wheat—Official confirmation last week of even more radical crop damage than the most sensational had claimed put the market on a decidedly different basis from that of previous weeks. According to these official figures the crop year beginning July 1 starts just 70,000,000 bushels smaller than last year and there were exports last year of about 89,000,000 bushels. It will be seen at a glance, therefore, that the total necessary to export to leave reserves as large at the end of the present as at the end of the last crop year is but 19,000,000 bushels. This is practically a domestic basis, as it is figured that there are about 24,000,000 bushels available for export from the states of the Pacific Northwest. The latter wheat is as far removed from the leading markets of this country as is the wheat of foreign countries, the overland rail freight fully offsetting the ocean freight from almost any portion of the globe, with the 25 cents a bushel import duty added. Unless there is a revision of the official figures later or the spring wheat crop shows something of the powers of revival shown recently in Kansas, it would appear as though this country, with the aid of conservative selling on the part of the producer, could fight along comfortably through the year with the export factor eliminated.

Corn—Very little net gain in prices of corn was retained at the close of last week. Government figures promise the largest total crop ever raised. Some people are expecting a good run of old corn to market as soon as haying, harvesting and corn cultivation is ended, all now near in the corn belt.

Cotton—Were it not for the absence of outside trade in the cotton market, prices would have undoubtedly scored a good advance during the past week, especially in the new crop months. The news has been all in favor of the bull; cloudy and rainy weather has been an every day occurrence in the south Atlantic and middle southern states all week and in some places the fields are under water. Damage reports have been coming in daily telling of the poor prospects for the growing crop; a late start, poor stands and too wet to cultivate. Conditions are just the reverse in Texas and Oklahoma where dry weather and unusually high temperatures have reduced the crop and unless rain falls soon in these localities the crop will be cut down materially. The situation is such that the crop cannot afford to deteriorate any more if a large yield is to be made this year, which the world is so much in need of, and even if a large yield crop is to be harvested during the fall and winter, statisticians will not be able to figure the possibility of a large crop comparing the condition of the plant up to date with the condition it was in at the same time in 1904, 1906, and 1908 when the crop was around 13,500,000 bales. Curtailment has been in order wherever it was possible but even with a large curtailment by all the large mills the amount of old cotton to be carried over will be very small. Spot cotton at all points in the south is in good demand but receipts are very small which shows that there is very little cotton left to come forward. Of course the weather is the principal factor at the moment and a little later on we will have the boll weevil to contend with. The situation in our opinion is strong and we favor purchases of the new crop months on all weak spots.

Copper—The copper market continues dull and uninteresting but prices seem to be gradually working to a lower level. Small sales of the metal are being made daily but as yet the production is so much in excess of the consumption that stocks of the metal are piling up every month. There is some foreign demand for copper metal but as yet it has not become a factor although with a further weakness in the metal a good business can be expected to materialize. While a number of the small mines have shut down indefinitely on account of the low price of copper the larger mines in the Butte district, the Greene Cananea and the big mines in Utah and Nevada are steadily increasing their output. All of the mines are selling their ore for much less than it is reasonably worth, but it is much cheaper to continue operations rather than shut down and a few of the mines are actually operating at a loss. The situation at the moment is anything but encouraging and, until there is something done to check the heavy accumulations of the metal, stocks will seek a lower level.

Auto Items

William Bolger, the man who is driving the Chalmers "30," that is now the only car with a perfect score in the Glidden tour, is well known in western autoing circles. Because of this local enthusiasts are noting his success in piloting the car with unusual interest. Confidence in his ability to bring the machine through without a single point being detracted is growing daily and numerous congratulatory telegrams have already been forwarded to him from San Francisco.

T. C. Black who has driven his big Peerless car in excess of 17,500 miles, using Monogram oil constantly, recently made a thorough investigation of his engine and was surprised to find absolutely no carbon. This is a wonderful record and well indicates the possibilities of lubricants when pure and properly refined.

world of the virtues is at work—courage, anxieties bravely concealed, humanity on the part of the brutal, kindness shown by the unkind—it becomes admirable. A little deeper, and the basis of it all is perceived to be selfishness, lust, and greed; it becomes, for its fine trappings, primitive and sordid. Deeper still, and you see the terrible abyss, empty as death, over which it hangs; and it becomes, according to your temperament, the most cruel of farces or most hideous of tragedies. If your mind insists on carrying you below the surface, you had better stop at the third story down; or, if you are an incorrigible sentimentalist, at the fourth. No deeper, at your peril: you have no business there, you can do nothing there except suffer and be miserable—and what good is that? Fortunately there seems to be no tendency on the part of the principal patrons to descend below the surface; for, if the custom were otherwise, this cafe-restaurant would close next week.

One deeper interest than that of the mere surface it is, perhaps, permissible to notice—at any rate for me, as I am not an habitue. It has the tragic fascination of all places that hold eloquent echoes and memories of voices and faces departed. Amid the gay, merry throng at the many tables, beside those who feast and those who sing, between lover and mistress, buyer and bought, sit the ghosts of men and women who have feasted there, who have been glad there, been sorry there. They sit, for those who have eyes to see them, like skeletons at the nightly feast, to remind the revellers that joy may endure for a night but that heaviness comes in the morning; and that heaviness rather than happiness is the true nature of the life of pleasure. For many of those ghosts this scene of color and movement, of brilliant, tragic activity, with its smouldering fires and its endless languishing strains of music, has been their last heaven-upon-earth—so real and desirable to them once, so entirely unreal and unimportant now! And for you, also, who are not a ghost, its reality will only last while you are there. Once let the great doors swing behind you and you are in another world, on which, perhaps, the sun is just rising. And long after the summer dawn has come, it may be full garish night in the cafe; only you will not believe it. It is the night of a dream, the city of a dream, of which, if you searched for it by daylight, you would find no trace.

Auto Notes

Manager Holmes of the stage line that runs from Susanville in Lassen County, California, to Reno, Nevada, has just taken delivery of a Moline car from the Hugo Muller Auto Co. for passenger service over this route. Mr. Holmes states that he already has a Moline which he has been using on the run since 1907. The car is still giving excellent service and has a reputation that extends through this entire section. Some months ago the sheriff of Lassen County accompanied by six passengers took the machine into the Wild Horse Mine over an extremely steep grade. Several cars had before attempted this run and all had met with serious disaster. As a consequence the road had been abandoned until the Moline succeeded in negotiating it. This achievement stimulated several other makes into renewed efforts to duplicate the feat but all have failed.

Will M. Cressy, the Rockefeller of the vaudeville stage, has been spending his vacation in Southern California and Mexico in company with his wife and friends, traveling some 3,000 miles in his Rambler automobile. He visited the City of Mexico and all points of interest en route. On this trip Mr. Cressy has taken some three hundred photographs. He reports having had but one puncture and the expense of repairs on his car was five cents. In consequence Mr. Cressy is a Rambler booster.

C. F. Noyes of Los Angeles, accompanied by his wife, son and partner, has just arrived in San Francisco, having driven up from the southern metropolis in his Premier Car. The coast route was taken and Mr. Noyes reports that the roads throughout have been excellently repaired. The La Honda grade has received much attention and is in good condition. The car ran perfectly all the way and made good time. Mr. Noyes also reports that the roads are swarming with automobile tourists.

H. A. Taussig who made a trans-continental trip from San Francisco to New York in his Thomas Flyer and later used it in touring Europe is now making a tour of the Western States. Writing to his friend Calvin C. Eib of the Pioneer Automobile Co., from Olequa, Washington, he said: "Eight hundred and seventy-eight miles from San Francisco. Had delightful run up California Coast to Crescent City, then across to Grants Pass and on to Portland. Hope to reach Seattle today. The trip has been thoroughly enjoyed by the entire party."

Among the local dealers whom the unusually prosperous auto trade of this season has sent East to arrange for increased allotments of cars is C. S. Howard who has just returned from a trip to the Buick factory in Flint, Michigan. Howard is not the only Buick dealer who has experienced a demand for the car exceeding allotment arrangements and consequently he found Buick distributors from all over the country gathered at the factories on the same mission on which he had gone East. This naturally meant some strenuous hustling on his part, but so pleased were the factory officials with the remarkable business built up out here, that he succeeded in arranging for unprecedented additional shipments which are due to arrive in the near future. Among other things Howard reports himself especially well pleased with the business that the local branch has done while he has been away, and equally so with the racing honors annexed by the Buick during his absence. One of the first things he did on arriving home was to look up Frank Murray and congratulate him on his miraculous escape in the Fresno-Coalinga road race accident and to commend his grit in entering later races on the same day.

O. H. Bullene, Salinas agent for the Howard Automobile Co., is in town to take delivery of a Buick "30" which he will drive back home. Mr. Bullene reports that preparations are being made for extensive repairs on the road running from Salinas to Monterey. This drive which offers some of the finest scenery in the State has been more or less neglected of late, but the repairs now under way will convert it into a magnificent boulevard.

W. L. Brown, manager of Sudden & Christensen Lumber Co. of Los Angeles, has just driven up from the southern metropolis in his Autocar. Mr. Brown was accompanied by his family and the entire party report a most enjoyable trip. The car ran perfectly all the way and reached San Francisco in great shape. Some two weeks will be spent in this locality and Mr. Brown contemplates making several local tours before returning home.

Mr. J. B. Sanford, proprietor of the Dispatch Democrat at Ukiah, has arrived in town in his Chalmers car, having run it two thousand miles since taking delivery in the early part of May, without even so much as a puncture. He reports having climbed hills near his home which a horse and buggy cannot make.

Morgan & Wright Nobby Tread tires are proving decided favorites with pathfinders this season. Nobbies equipped the famous Chalmers "30" that scouted out the Glidden tour route with such marked success. They are now being worn by the E-M-F car which is pathfinding through the East for the Munsey Reliability Contest.

Tony Nichols, president of the Weinstock Nichols Company, writes from Detroit where he is visiting the Morgan & Wright factory that the plant is pushed to its utmost capacity to meet orders. The foreign department is doing a surprisingly big business, this being especially so with Nobby Tread tires.

Fred M. Wilcox of Los Angeles who owns a Franklin car reports an unusual service record for the two front tires which it wears. These tires which are Diamonds, have been in constant service for one year and have covered 15,343 miles as shown by a Warner Autometer. Neither has ever been off the rim nor pumped up since put on the car.

A Story of This City

We have had graft stories and slum stories ad nauseam. Thanks be, Charles Tenney Jackson has found a new point of view and has given us a glimpse of both sides, from the viewpoint of the go-between who, while identified with neither side in the see-saw, forms the connecting link and enables them to do business without coming into contact. "The Day of Souls" is an uncommonly interesting and well told story which does not depend on muckraking or any shadow of that occupation to hold the attention of readers. The title is derived from the Japanese festival, the night when all descendants of the old Samurai families keep watch and ward by the arms of their ancestors under the belief that the souls of the valiant dead return to ask an accounting of them and that to be worthy of the judgment they must have cleansed their souls. The scene is San Francisco and the plot deals almost entirely with the night side of life, centering about a miserable cheap boarding house in Washington street, just beyond the border of Chinatown. It is there that J. Hamilton Arnold has his residence, and there that most of the odd and incongruous characters come together. Arnold was fitted by nature and early environment for a better social position. He was the son of Seldon Arnold, a wealthy resident of the San Joaquin Valley, interested in vast irrigation schemes, and this only child, motherless, had had the usual bringing up of a rich man's son, ample indulgence and a good education. Selden Arnold had had the hardihood to favor a candidate obnoxious to the railroad company, and he had been used as an example to keep other insurgents in line. The backers of his enterprises were influenced to withdraw and he became a bankrupt and a convicted criminal and was now serving a sentence in the State penitentiary. The men who had been his former friends and neighbors had turned on him and having reorganized his enterprises, they were reaping the harvest. It goes without saying that they virtually controlled the political situation in both State and city, and it was with the hope of influencing them to obtain a pardon for his father that J. Hamilton Arnold became their tool and degenerated into "Hammy," the tenderloin rounder, the handler of the bribe money, the one to bring pressure to bear when needed, the familiar associate of bartenders, pugilists and other links too low down for the real manipulators to touch hands with while at the same time he was on hail fellow terms with the gilded youths of the select set. Hamilton Arnold had more than an average share of good qualities and it is hardly fair of Mr. Jackson to blame "the town" for what he made of himself. It is true enough that the gilded saloons, the pool rooms, the slot machines and the prize fights will help any man down once he begins to slide, but on the other hand, if it were not for the large number only too pleased with the exhilaration of the decline, these institutions would not flourish. It is a curious coterie to which Arnold introduces Sylvia Spring, the confiding girl who has come to San Francisco from the wilds of Trinity County, on his solicitation, to marry him. Sylvia knows nothing of town or town ways for she has lived in "the country in back," sixty miles from a railroad and far away from telegraphs, telephones and daily papers. She is far more unsophisticated than the conventional village maid, and very much in love with Arnold who has met her on one of his wandering expeditions when he happened into the wilderness and with his easy good nature, and talented versatility helped the Ladies' Aid Society to stage a home production of "Pinafore." Arnold is not to be confounded with the traditional stage villain. Nothing is further from his intention than to do any wrong to Sylvia or for that matter, any other girl, in the usually accepted sense. He is not in love with her but as it happens, she is possessed of property of considerable value, and now, having tired of his unavailing efforts to obtain the freedom of his father by the underground political route, he sees an opportunity of making another start in a new direction on the proceeds of Sylvia's little fortune, and no doubt he would have made good, but that he was called upon by his masters to render further service by perjuring himself before the Grand Jury in connection with some registration frauds. He must either do this or see his friend, Weldy, abandoned. Weldy has a wife and babies and an old mother to share his disgrace, and moreover, it was Arnold who introduced him to politics. There seems nothing to be done but "take program" and this to Arnold means that he must abandon any hope of extrication. He will not drag the girl down so he parts with her advising her to return to her home. She does not follow his advice but he, losing sight of her, imagines her to be safe with her friends in Trinity until, long after, he discovers that he is believed to have robbed, wronged and abandoned her. After parting with Sylvia, Arnold gives up his idea of drawing out and sinks gradually deeper into the mire until he is brought suddenly up by the suicide of another youth, a bookkeeper who, following a tip from Arnold, bets the money he has misappropriated at one of the pool rooms, and finding himself a loser, blows out his brains at one of the gorgeous saloons owned by a police commissioner. It is a decidedly ugly picture that is put before us when Arnold, having broken with his former owners, attempts to earn an honest living but finds himself shut out at every turn either by direct interference or by the rising up of his former record. After trying first one occupation and then another, sometimes finding himself incompetent but oftener discovering that there were plausible reasons why he was not wanted, we find him at last, amongst the ranks of the horny handed, a cement-mixer's helper, earning an honest $1.75 a day, instead of collecting $165 a month as a Senate clerk and never needing to appear in the Senate chamber, picking up odd thousands on race track and fight tips and losing it as easily, borrowing odd twenties and lending others; while Nell, his friend, who has spent her unconsidered hundreds every month on jewelry and frocks and ridden in her automobile, is held back from a reckless plunge by the problem of who is to get an old man his breakfast. Decidedly this is an inspiring book though Mr. Jackson has not stood on his toes to write it. It deals with the old town before the fire, but we are spared any rhapsodical reflections. It is not written at one, and though it is in no sense a tract, there are morals enough to be drawn. Perhaps we all need a "Day of Souls" in which to take reckoning and determine our share in the complicity which has made things what they are, the tolerance with which we accept and excuse because it is too much trouble to prevent or correct. At any rate, this is an exceptionally good book and has an assured place in the fictional history or historical fiction of San Francisco. From the Bobbs-Merrill Co.

A Strange Marriage

"Happy is the bride that the sun shines on," runs the old saying, the deeper meaning of which, according to some people, is that every mishap at a wedding is an omen of bad fortune and future unhappiness. Nevertheless, there are times when the most unusual wedding incidents, and the unhappiest of honeymoons, have resulted in happy marriages.

Take for instance the case recently reported from Bordeaux of a young man who, two years ago, was, like Edmond Dantes in "The Count of Monte Cristo," arrested when about to sign the marriage contract with a girl to whom he had been betrothed for five years. The charge brought against him was one of forgery. The evidence was very strong, but the girl believed in her lover and insisted on the marriage. The authorities gave the necessary permission, and the couple were married before the trial came off.

Never was there a stranger honeymoon, the husband in prison awaiting trial and the wife moving heaven and earth, as the saying goes, to procure his release. And she was successful, the real culprit being discovered at the eleventh hour. This case reminds one very much of that of an American bridegroom who, on leaving the church with his bride on his arm, was arrested and conveyed to the nearest police station. The charge of embezzlement was brought against him. He was bailed out, and managed to appease the wrath of his father-in-law by declaring that it was all a mistake. It was not until a few days later, however, during which the suspense of the bride may be better imagined than described, that the authorities admitted their mistake, having located the real culprit.

It appears that some time previously they had received instructions to be on the lookout for a young fellow who had been guilty of embezzlement, and had received an anonymous letter to the effect that the embezzler was to be married at a certain church at such an hour. By some extraordinary mistake they went to the Catholic instead of the Protestant Church and—arrested the wrong man.

An Improvident Couple

It is said that love laughs at locksmiths, but that love is sometimes glad to avail itself of locks has been proved by the honeymoon of a Philadelphia couple who one morning were obliged to ask the authorities of Cincinnati to grant them shelter until they had wired home for money to defray necessary expenses. It appears that they had been rather reckless in their expenditures, and could not pay their return fare. The money turned up in due course of time, and the improvident bride and bridegroom returned. It augured bad for future home management, and everybody prophesied a miserable future; but a Philadelphia pressman, who learned the whole story, says that the marriage is proving one of the happiest on record.

Honeymoon in Quarantine

Probably one of the queerest predicaments in which a bride ever found herself was that experienced by a young lady of Leeds six years ago, who spent her honeymoon in quarantine. At the time of her wedding the bride and her mother were suffering from smallpox, and the source of the infection was traced to the brother of the bridegroom. The consequence was that the sanitary authorities gave instructions for the principals of the wedding party to be segregated, while the guests were kept under observation in the towns to which they belonged.

A memorable honeymoon was that of a sea captain and his wife in March of last year. Directly after the wedding the ship of which the bridegroom was master was dispatched from Harburg to Berwick-on-Tweed, and the bride decided to accompany her husband. When two days out a terrible gale was experienced. The vessel sprang a leak, and the crew worked hard at the pumps to keep the ship afloat. Ultimately the ship reached the Tweed, but had no sooner rounded Berwick Pier, in tow for Leith, to be repaired, than the hawser broke and the heavy sea drove the vessel on the rocks.

The crew and the wife of the master refused to leave the vessel, although communication with the shore was established. It was a terrible time, even for the most seasoned mariner on board, but the bride preferred to remain with her husband until the sea calmed down and permitted the vessel to be extricated from its perilous position.

Jefferson Knew His Man

While "Joe" Jefferson was down in Florida one winter he met an old friend. They had a long talk over old times, during which Mr. Jefferson inquired about a common friend of theirs who used to play with him in Rip Van Winkle. "Well, Joe, the last time I saw him he was in London, and, would you believe it, he has become very profane." "When I knew him," said Mr. Jefferson, "he was pigeon-toed and chicken-breasted, so it does not surprise me that he is foul-mouthed now."

The Fly Grocer

The country grocer was issuing instructions to his new assistant.

"It's only by looking closely after the trifles," said the proprietor, "that a profit can be made in these days of sharp competition."

"Yes, sir," came from the boy.

"For example," continued the grocer, "when you pick flies out of the sugar, don't throw them away. Dust the sugar off their feet and put 'em among the currants."

Maud—Is Jack constant in love?
Ethel—No, constantly.

"And are you on good terms with your mother-in-law?"

"Excellent; only speak by telephone."

"Reginald, dear, you puckered up your lips just then as if you were going to kiss me," said the beautiful creature, languorously, as she lay stretched on the beach surveying the frolics of Neptune.

"I intended to," replied Reginald, hesitatingly, "but seem to have got some sand in my mouth."

"For heaven's sake, swallow it," exclaimed the young lady. "You need it badly in your system."

$3.50 Recipe Cures Weak Kidneys

FREE

Wouldn't it be nice within a week or so to begin to say goodbye forever to the scalding, dribbling, straining, or too frequent passage of urine; the forehead and the back-of-the-head aches; the stitches and pains in the back; the growing muscle weakness; spots before the eyes; yellow skin; sluggish bowels; swollen eyelids or ankles; leg cramps; unnatural short breath; sleeplessness and the despondency?

I have a recipe for these troubles that you can depend on, and if you want to make a quick recovery, you ought to write and get a copy of it. Many a doctor would charge you $3.50 just for writing this prescription, but I have it and will be glad to send it to you entirely free. Just drop me a line like this: Dr. A. E. Robinson, K 601 Luck Building, Detroit, Mich., and I will send it by return mail in a plain envelope. As you will see when you get it, this recipe contains only pure, harmless remedies, but it has great healing and pain-conquering power.

It will quickly show its power once you use it, so I think you had better see what it is without delay. I will send you a copy free—you can use it and cure yourself at home.

A water system not for to-day but for all time

"We should build a water system not for one summer, but for half a century to come. A system that shall once for all meet the needs of a future city and be capable of almost automatic expansion as these needs increase."

Former President Roosevelt in a letter to the Merchants Association of New York.

SUCH is the water system we propose to bring into your city; a system that will meet the needs of the East Bay Cities for all time; a system that will automatically expand and that will automatically drop its price as it expands.

The East Bay Cities are now paying higher water rates than any other cities of their size in the United States. Why not do what you can towards having your city pay the lowest? Why not settle this water question now, once and for all?

Contract to buy our water and you will get a supply that is practically inexhaustible; you will get water that is clear, sweet and absolutely pure, and you will get it at a price that will permit you to use it when and how you please.

In a report based on a personal visit to our water sheds, Engineers Chapman and Bannister of Alameda said, "All of the reservoir sites are 1,750 feet above sea level and are higher than any reservoirs now in use in supplying the Bay cities with water. All slopes and water courses indicate that but little sediment is washed down by the water in winter and there is no evidence that the ground has a tendency to slip."

That is why we can guarantee the water we will bring into the East Bay Cities to be clear, sweet and absolutely pure. It is the water you and your family should have. It is the water your city should have if it is to take its rank among the cities of the West.

A primary factor in the growth of a city is the quantity, quality and price of its water. We have the quantity; we have the quality; we are ready to make the price a lower one than you have ever paid.

But our coming here and the making of this price are in your hands. When we have signed contracts aggregating 5,000,000 gallons per day we start work upon our plant. Within fifteen months we shall be delivering water into your home. When our contracts aggregate 19,000,000 gallons per day the rate will automatically drop to 25 cents a 1000 gallons.

The Modern Oracle

Banished to the limbo of forgotten things is the question that perplexed us for many years: What shall we do with our ex-presidents? For this as for all other questions that have engaged the public mind since his accession to the office of Pontifex Maximus that most versatile of mortals, Colonel Roosevelt, has found a solution. Our only ex-president has relieved us of all anxiety regarding himself by establishing a clearance house for political tittle-tattle, and constituting himself authentic distributor of counsels adapted to the infinite concerns of politicians of all complexions and all States. In this job the Colonel will transmute his prestige into an abundance of ready money. For all the while the product of his type-writer will be in constant demand, and his words will sell like hot cakes no matter what the subject he may care to discuss. And there is no subject that he cannot discuss with some degree of human intelligence. Moreover there is no question under the sun that can give him pause, no darkness in any of the corners of this sublunary sphere that he will not attempt to disperse. He stands ready to expose errors wherever they congregate, in matters of pure curiosity as well as in speculation, moral or intellectual, and the people are hanging on his inspired lips. As in the land of the blind the one-eyed man is king Colonel Roosevelt is easily the crowned first citizen of this republic. Everything he says has something of the sanctity with which the Romans invested the augury of the twelve vultures handed down from the days of Romulus. So there remains nothing for him to do but to preserve his prestige as did the Oracles that counseled the Grecian people until triumphant ridicule drove them into disrepute.

Our Consular Service

The consular service of this country has reached such a high degree of efficiency that our foreign rivals in commerce are beginning to sit up and take notice in the most remote corners of the earth. Our consular service has become a most aggressive agency for trade expansion much to the consternation of our competitors in the far-flung marts of trade where in the years agone American consuls where recognized as nothing but political hacks who were maintained in ease and luxury by a paternal government by way of reward for successful manipulation of election machinery. The great improvement that has taken place in our consular service is due to the Root-Lodge bill by which it was reorganized in 1906. Since then entrance and promotion in the service has depended almost entirely upon fitness and merit. As a result the average of personnel is much higher than it was a few years ago. The work and worth of our consuls are now measured chiefly by commercial standards. They are required to keep the State Department informed about trade and trade conditions and to exert themselves for the purpose of trade expansion. Our exporters and importers are in touch with them directly or through the Department, and continuance in the service and promotion are assured only on condition that they vindicate their intelligence and their fidelity to duty. There are now in the service about 1100 consuls-general, vice and deputy consuls, consuls, agents and subordinate officials, yet the net cost of maintenance is only about $250,000 a year. While the gross cost is over $2,000,000 the revenue from fees amounts to nearly $1,800,000. There is no department of the government so well managed as the consular and none from which we derive so much benefit.

The Worship of Machinery

The Charter Revision Convention has adjourned after doing work that meets with the hearty approval of the Examiner. It has proposed five amendments to the charter which, the veracious journal of the plain people tells us, "are likely to prove of vital importance to the city." The amendments provide for direct nominations, for non-partisan elections, for a simplified initiative, referendum and recall, and for the acquisition of all street railroad properties. These amendments, according to the Examiner, will enable the people to get precisely what they need. If we take the Examiner's word for it there will be nothing to worry about after the adoption of these amendments; they will solve all questions that are the peculiar topics of the present hour, questions of expediency, questions of morality, all questions of right and wrong. The Examiner's faith in the supernatural powers of machinery is sublime. Our memory runneth not to the time when the Examiner was not rolling in an ecstasy induced by the discovery of some mechanical device that had brought the millennium within hailing distance. We distinctly remember that when the Australian ballot was invented the Examiner's emotions were akin to those of a lean horse turned loose in a June pasture of lush and succulent grasses. The Examiner recognized in the Australian ballot the handiwork of God, and predicted that it would metamorphose politics and render the people secure in all their rights. But the transports and raptures produced by that clairvoyant ballot were insignificant compared with those into which the susceptible and emotional Hearst journal was plunged when the present charter came from the hands of its inspired authors. If it had been inscribed on tablets of stone and duly authenticated as a divine performance it could not have excited greater enthusiasm in the Examiner office, nor could it have been received with more profound veneration. So great was the reverence in which the charter was held before it was tested, that no one might question the soundness of its principles without being suspected of all manner of mean motives. We were told that the charter was guaranteed to make the government as clean as a whistle, and that it was inconceivable that any decent citizen should vote against its adoption. Yet this is the charter that the Examiner wishes to have amended. It is admitted that there is room for improvement in our municipal affairs, and the Examiner, strong as ever in its faith in machinery, is celebrating some new devices guaranteed as usual to produce all the desired effects and insure the one and only beneficent consummation. Sincerely we hope that the political millennium is at hand. But we are sceptical. We do not believe that any great progress is to be made toward ethical perfection by means of machinery. Nor do we think that the best political machinery is that which makes elections frequent and the mob more sensitive to the exhortations of a corrupt, demagogic press and an illiterate and degenerate pulpit. Indeed we are not at all enthusiastic about political machinery. We think the fact is pretty well established that every people gets the kind of government it deserves, and we feel sure that we deserve the kind of government we are getting because we are tolerant of ministers whose incompetency has weakened the influence of religion and of newspapers that disseminate vulgarity and promote demoralization.

History That Disillusions

As we not only read history through our prejudices but find pleasure chiefly in such history as most appeals to our prejudices, James H. Stark's history "The Loyalists of Massachusetts," is not likely to become a best-seller. Stark has taken the trouble to rescue from oblivion the bad as well as the good deeds of the men that started the American revolution, and the consequence is that to despise their ancestors is the price that sons and daughters of Revolutionary sires must pay for the truth which the Boston historian has been at considerable pains to gather. But Stark has not constituted himself a witness of the past merely for the purpose of casting discredit on the men that made Colonial history. He is a sincere, conscientious historian strong in the conviction that if a thousand old legends are to be ruined in our march to truth we must still march on. And why not? Why should we go on applauding the balderdash of Fourth of July orators who think that in order to make the eagle scream with delight they must deify the demagogues that were rampant more than a hundred years ago. There is enough that is creditable in our history without distorting facts and perpetuating fiction for the greater glory of the founders of the nation. Among those founders there were many genuine heroes, many noble patriots. Why should we maintain on a level with them a lot of unscrupulous politicians? Or why, because of their inability to dissuade the multitude from being dishonest and dishonorable, should we blink the truth and hold fast to all that is pleasing in tradition merely out of deference to our prejudices? If, for example, as the historian reminds us, the Congress of the United States was guilty of the infamy of violating the treaty of Versailles by which England sought to exact protection for the Loyalists, is it not puerile, nay nonsensical, to sequester this fact, thus to increase our national pride by ignorance and spare us the pain of being conscious of the misdeeds of our forbears. If history is to advantage us as philosophy teaching by example then it is well that all that is true should be accessible. In this matter of the violation of the treaty it should be known that Alexander Hamilton was as usual on the side of right and that as a consequence the men that opposed him were popular. Of great benefit would it be for the people today to know more of Hamilton's views in general, more about the principles of his conduct and something of the reasons why he has not appealed to the popular imagination so strongly as some of his far less worthy contemporaries. And knowing more of the motives and political principles of the leaders of thought in that generation we should have less difficulty in apprehending the character of the politicians of today. So it is well for us to be disillusioned with respect to events that have been pictured in deceptive colors. This important business of disillusioning is what Mr. Stark has devoted himself to in his history. And he has gone as far back as those hidebound bigots, the Pilgrim Fathers who, though they never practiced the first principles of religious liberty are still regarded as the fathers of American liberty.

Ballinger and the Muckrakers

Secretary Ballinger will doubtless be exonerated. The muckrakers conscious of the failure of the Secretary's enemies to prove their charges are now saying that the committee which conducted the investigation was packed for whitewashing purposes. It was in anticipation of his vindication that they garbled the reports of the testimony taken at Washington and by all the arts of their trade darkened the issue and gave as much prominence as possible to matters entirely irrelevant. So now we are told, as we knew we should be told, that the exoneration meant whitewashing by a committee selected for that and no other purpose. Secretary Ballinger is not a man that appeals to our admiration. Neither temperamentally nor intellectually does he approximate what we conceive to be essential to fitness for membership in the President's cabinet. Discovered by Roosevelt, he does not reach far above the plane occupied by the lightweights of the Roosevelt cabinet, and it would have been better had he been permitted to join the Bonapartes and Garfields in their return to private life. But there is nothing of which we may feel more absolutely assured than of the injustice of the attacks made on him by the conspirators who considered him a propitious medium through which they might exhaust their spleen and vindictiveness against the Taft administration. The charges against Ballinger were lost sight of immediately after the official investigation was started. His enemies seeing that they had nothing to support those charges save the suspicions and inferences of the discredited and conscienceless Glavis proceeded to scrutinize all his private and official acts with a view to raking up something that might justify assumptions of the possibility of wrongdoing. Everything that savored of a lapse from the strictest principles of ethical behaviour they made the subject of inquiry, and demanded that only such construction as was damaging to the Secretary should be placed thereon. A saint much less a Ballinger could not defy this principle of investigation. But as for the specific charges against the Secretary, the charges that implied official turpitude, they were substantiated by nothing that would be recognzied as evidence in a court of justice. Nevertheless we are told that the report of the committee is of no consequence, since Ballinger has been convicted before the bar of public opinion. And this, it is humiliating to confess, is about the only truth with reference to Ballinger that has come from the muckrakers. Having poisoned the minds of the people with misrepresentation, they now point with pride to the verdict of their hoodwinked jury.

Corporation-Baiting

"Business," says a writer in the Examiner, "is done on enthusiasm and good cheer, and when you raise the cry of Stop Thief! you set in motion the forces of dissolution and destruction." The writer was discussing corporation-baiting in Texas, a State very much in need of development and suffering from a lack of railroad facilities, which is attributed to legislation hostile to railroads and capital. "Let the intelligent people of the beautiful Southwest," exclaims the Examiner writer, "look well to these politicians who do nothing but apply the brakes and talk; who maintain no payrolls. The doctrine of negation can never make a nation great." This is excellent advice, but why should it be addressed exclusively to the people of the beautiful Southwest? Aren't the people of the beautiful Northwest, the people of the shrieking Middlewest and the people of the somewhat comatose Far West in need of the very same advice? Where, indeed, in all this fair and teeming land are the politicians without payrolls and without anything but an inexhaustible supply of flubdub not engaged in applying the brakes and receiving the applause of enamored and hypnotized constituents? We have received the impression that the politicians who make the most noise and who are therefore esteemed the most virtuous and wise have convinced the people that more important than industrial development, more important than prosperity itself, is conservation of our resources. And if corporation-baiting has not become a national pastime we are laboring under a most melancholy delusion. Here in California at this minute there is no issue more noisily insisted upon that the one which is grounded in the hypothesis that the salvation of the State depends on the election of a man who has pledged himself to do all in his power to injure a great railroad system. The sole qualification upon which this man bases his claim to the suffrages of the people is his hostility to a railroad. His antecedents, his associations, his record for dubious practices, his forbidding personality, his habits of mind and professional proclivities—all these things we are asked not to consider in view of the circumstance that he is running for office on an anti-railroad platform. We are told that his purpose is to drive the railroad out of politics. But it is unreasonable to ask us to believe that he is appealing only to the sentiment of civic patriotism. We have a direct primary law. That law was enacted to emancipate the people from machine politics. Under that law the people have the power to elect whom they please to office If that law is what it is said to be (and we have no reason to believe to the contrary) then how absurd it is to suppose that anti-railroad sentiment in this campaign is entirely due to a righteous desire to eliminate the railroad from politics. Is it not more reasonable to suppose that the men who are inveighing against the railroad are encouraging among the envious and disgruntled the hope that if they get into office they will do some of the things that made politicians popular in Texas until the people of that State discovered that it is not to their advantage to hound and harass corporations?

Premonition

Now is her face like Fate inscrutable.
  Perhaps her heart still beats, but that cold brow
  And carven cheek and rigid lips allow
No changing flush to bide there, mutable
As morn with cryptic presage suitable
  And strange. Those eyes I loved, that even now
  I watch for hope, are doom to me and show
Dull as a dead desire, immutable.
  I know she will not change, but O, how hard
  It is to die like this and turn to stone!
  Better to burn with anguish unconsoled,
To be the prey of pain upon a lone,
  Wild peak beyond the world, than to be rolled
  In this sad shroud and laid beneath the sward.

Perspective Impressions

On his arrival in California Gifford Pinchot became the guest of Dr. Pardee. A case of the flocking together of birds of a feather.

"California asks San Francisco to elect Walter Macarthur," says the Boughten Bulletin. Who are the three tailors of Tooley street in this instance?

According to Plato the most virtuous of all men is he that contents himself with being virtuous without seeking to appear so. But Plato had never met a Roosevelt insurgent.

The Call in a characteristic eulogy of Gifford Pinchot describes him as a man who "smiles when he strikes." But even the Call despite the warmth of its admiration will not credit Mr. Pinchot with the more decent habit of rattling before he strikes.

The Hon. Charles F. Curry almost achieved the distinction of sacrificing himself on the altar of his political ambition.

Jimmy Garfield favors the "Recall," "which goes to show," says the Examiner, "that measures once denounced as radical, revolutionary and anarchistic, grow conservative, reasonable and desirable when viewed without prejudice." They do—in the judgment of persons who cannot perceive a trace of imbecility in such an argument.

When told that the United Railroads had brought suit against the city in a federal court the other day City Attorney Long said that while he had no knowledge of the cause of action neither had he any doubt as to the futility of the suit. This young man's instinctive prescience induces speculation as to whether his direct wire runs to heaven or hell.

The Observations of a Cynic

The Subject being the Hon. Hiram Johnson's Caustic Letter to the Republican State Central Committee Giving his Reasons for Regarding Himself as the Only Patriot Worthy of Honor and Distinction

By Demetrius

Somewhere I have read that the very name of a politician has always connected with it the ideas of treachery, cruelty, fraud and tyranny. and that those writers who have faithfully unveiled the mysteries of state-freemasonry have ever been held in general detestation for even knowing so perfectly a theory so detestable. It was years ago that I came across this observation. It made a deep impression on me and only the other day I mused over it after a long talk with my friend Cynicus, of the Daily Pharisee with whom I dined at the club.

Cynicus is a fine fellow, but journalism has dulled his sensibilities. He is a free lance in journalism; writes not what he believes but whatever he is paid to write and he says that nearly all of the editors of his acquaintance do the same thing. Years ago he was flouting the Pope for Pixley in the Argonaut and getting back at himself in the Monitor. "There is nothing I enjoy so much," he said, "as defending the Catholic church against my own attacks."

Cynicus has been touring the State with Hiram Johnson, and keeping the readers of the Pharisee posted on the progress of the great reform candidate. Being one of Mr. Johnson's most ardent supporters I was eager to hear from Cynicus all about that gentleman's whirlwind campaign, and so I invited him to dine with me. I must admit that he did not fill me with enthusiasm.

"Johnson will do things when he's governor," I observed for the purpose of starting the conversation as we took up our cocktails.

"Yes, said Cynicus, "he'll do things. He'll do the whole State. He has great capacity for doing—things."

I thought I detected a note of irony in my friend's tone, but I made no comment.

"He's giving the Southern Pacific some pretty hard smashes," I remarked.

"Very hard smashes," echoed Cynicus. "He's doing everything but tearing up the rails and demolishing the engines. You can see that he feels very sore about the railroad. His honest indignation is at white heat. As he rampages through the State he's like Bedlam on two legs. But I'm afraid it won't do him any good. Years ago lawyers used to talk themselves onto the S. P. payroll by giving the company hell, but the hard-hearted octopus no longer comes to terms with the patriots that revile it."

I looked at Cynicus in astonishment. "Do you mean to insinuate that Mr. Johnson would engage in such a practice," I demanded.

Cynicus gave me a smile of exasperating tolerance and proceeded to eat an olive. Presently he asked: "Would it astonish you to learn that Johnson once solicited employment from the S. P.?"

"Yes, it would astonish me very much." I replied. "I don't believe that he ever did, and I wouldn't believe it if the president of the company told me so."

"I'm not surprised to hear you say that. The men that are not to be convinced against their will form the legion from which political reformers recruit their dupes."

It was evident that Cynicus was disposed to become offensive so I switched the conversation to the subject of the bold letter which Mr. Johnson sent to the Republican State Central Committee refusing to agree to support the ticket nominated at the primary election. I asked Cynicus if he didn't regard the letter as a powerful and sincere document.

"Yes," he replied, "the claptrap of it was most powerful; and the affected sincerity of it was thoroughly characteristic of an unscrupulous shyster."

This language shocked me, and with some spirit I told Cynicus that he shouldn't permit his prejudice to embitter his criticism.

He smiled in a rather sneering fashion, and I was somewhat exasperated. But Cynicus respects no one's feelings.

"So you approve Johnson's letter," he said. "Well you're not at all exceptional in your approval. The mob is full of men who feed ravenously on buncombe. And like you they hate to have their attention called to their perverted appetite. When persons better informed than they correctly characterize their favorite pabulum they resent enlightenment and impute prejudice or intolerance to the one that commiserates their ignorance. As a rule I am not disposed to disabuse the darkened mind of its crotchets and delusions, but as I know that you're not incorrigible I will take the trouble to dissect this Johnson letter by way of experiment to see whether your perceptive faculties are accessible to reason."

This top-lofty, dogmatic air is characteristic of Cynicus. And you have to indulge him or lose his friendship.

He went on: "Now the whole sum and substance of this letter of Johnson's is that the Republican State Central Committee which asked him whether he would support the candidates nominated at the primary by the Republicans of the State, forfeited the right to represent the party because it recently tabled a certain resolution which repudiated the influence heretofore exercised by the political bureau of the Southern Pacific Company in the councils of the party and in the government of the State, and called upon all party candidates to declare their opposition to this resolution. Is this not a correct synopsis of the letter?"

I admitted that it was.

"Well now," said Cynicus. "admitting that the State Central Committee has forfeited its right to represent the party, how can that circumstance exempt Mr. Johnson, who swears that he is a Republican and who is availing himself of the provisions of the direct primary law, from abiding by the decision of the Republican voters of the State whose endorsement he is soliciting?"

I made no reply, resolving to hear Cynicus to the end.

"The direct primary," he went on. "is intended as everybody knows to purify party organization. Mr. Johnson is the standard-bearer of the reformers who clamored for this law. Yet we find him repudiating not the State Central Committee alone, but the spirit of the law under which he is trying to get himself into the gubernatorial job. Posing as a Republican, he virtually admits that he may become a turncoat after the primary election. In this letter which you so ardently approve he says: 'I scorn the State Central Committee of my party because it is controlled by the railroad, and I have no confidence in the judgment of the Republican voters of California. If they do not nominate me then I will be sure that the majority of my party is composed either of damphools or knaves. I will be in doubt as to their morals and judgment until after the primary. Meanwhile I will do them the great honor of soliciting their support.' In other words Mr. Johnson wishes to go his way undisciplined. undecalogued. unfetterd, a roaring lion among the inferior fauna of the State—in short a sort of glorified pariah. Have I in the slightest degree wandered from the truth?"

"You are stating the case from your own standpoint."

"Have I been guilty of a misstatement?"

"You have put words in Mr. Johnson's mouth."

The Age of Love

By Paul Bourget (From the French)

When I submitted to the editor of Le Boulevard, the most literary of the great Parisian dailies, my projected inquiry into the "Age of Love," he seemed astonished that an idea so thoroughly "journalistic"—that was his word—should have been evolved by the youngest member of his staff. I had been in his employ only a couple of weeks, and it was my first newspaper position.

"Finish stating your proposition, my dear Labarthe," he said, a little less insolently than usual.

He seemed to weigh the further details which I offered, and approved them with a nod of his head.

"Not so bad," he admitted. "You propose, then, to ask various ladies and gentlemen, first, at what age one loves most deeply, and second, at what age one is most deeply loved. Is that your idea? Well, whom are you going to interview?"

"I have made out a list," I replied, drawing from my pocket a scrap of paper on which I had scribbed the names of those personages whom I intended to interrogate on this palpitating question. It included a general, two former cabinet ministers, a Dominican friar, four actresses, two of whom occasionally graced cafe-concerts, four actors, of whom one had been decorated, two financiers, two lawyers, a surgeon, a physician, and a number of literary celebrities. As I read the list, some of the names were approved by a nod; at the mention of others, my chief would say shortly, with his affectation of American brevity: "No good. Strike him off." Finally I reached the name I had reserved for the last, that of Pierre Fauchery, the famous novelist.

"Scratch him too," said the editor, shrugging his shoulders. "We've had a disagreement."

"Nevertheless," I insinuated, "there is no one whose opinion would be more interesting to our readers, especially to the women. I had meant to begin with him."

"Parbleu!" interrupted the chief, "but it is Fauchery's principle never to receive reporters. If I have sent one to him, I have sent ten, and he has shown them all the door. Le Boulevard is not accustomed to be trifled with, and we have rubbed it into him two or three times. So you see—"

"I shall get an interview out of Fauchery all the same," I interrupted "and for Le Boulevard, too. I am certain of it."

"If you manage that," said my chief looking at me with cynical interest, "there will be two extra louis in it for you. He rather wearies me, my fine gentleman who affects to abhor publicity. Why doesn't he take it like the rest of them? But," he added, shrugging his shoulders, "you won't get it. Still, let's hear your sure method."

"You will permit me to keep that until afterward," I replied, gaining assurance from his interest in my pocket. "In forty-eight hours you shall know whether I have succeeded."

"Go ahead, then; and don't handle the old hypocrite too tenderly."

Decidedly I had made some progress as a journalist, in spite of my short apprenticeship, since I could calmly allow the lordly Pascal, the abominable Philistine on whom I was dependent, to talk thus of the man I most admired among living writers. But, since that day when, tired of not being able to eat when I was hungry, I had determined to try my luck in the Parisian newspaper scrimmage, I had labored systematically to slough off my old self, as lizards do their skins, and I had very nearly succeeded. I knew very well, having the proof of it in a drawer full of half-finished poems, dramas and novels, that there had once existed—a "once" which was dated only six weeks before—a certain Jules Labarthe who had come up to Paris from his country town with the intention of becoming a great man. This person, who believed in Literature (with a capital), in Glory (another capital), and in the Ideal (a third capital), was dead and buried. It was barely possible that some day he might begin to write again for the love of writing. But, for the moment, I neither knew nor admitted the existence of any other Labarthe than the one who had gone into journalism, with the idea of acquiring, as soon as possible, an income of thirty thousand francs per year. What did it matter to this latter individual if the vulgar Pascal boasted of having "rubbed it into" the most delicate and powerful of the disciples of Balzac? All the more, as I myself—the new Labarthe—was about to conduct an operation quite as vulgar as any of the proceedings of my editor-in-chief?

I had, in fact, a sure method of getting an interview with Fauchery, which may be explained as follows: In my period of puerile naivete, I had sent several of my stories and verses to the great novelist, the very ones whose rejection by numerous publishers had induced me to enter journalism. Fauchery, then on a foreign tour, had replied. I had answered with a letter to which he had again replied, asking me to pay him a call. I had called, only to find that he was not in. I had gone again, and again I had missed him. Thereafter, a sort of shame had kept me from making another attempt. So I had never seen him, and he knew me only as the young Eliakim of my two epistles. It was upon this acquaintance that I counted to gain from him what he certainly would have refused to a journalist. My plan was quite simple: I would present myself as the young writer with whom he had exchanged letters, concealing my present profession. Then I would set forth some vague plot for a novel, built around the general theme of the "Age of Love," and request his opinion. I felt some remorse when I thought of his feelings upon seeing his conversation set down in cold print. I stifled it, however, with the words: "Struggle for existence," and also with the recollection of numerous examples of this sort of thing practised by the fraternity to which I should hereafter have the honor to belong.

On the day following that on which I had the foregoing highly literary conversation with my chief, I rang at the door of the little hotel which Pierre Fauchery occupied in the rue Desbordes-Valmore, in a retired corner of Passy. Since I have set out to narrate a simple story in all its verity, I do not know why I should not confess that I felt a pitiful sensation of pleasure, while the bell was ringing, at the thought that I was about to play a petty trick upon the host of this peaceful retreat. One does not make such a renunciation as I had made, without cherishing a residue of envy against those who have triumphed in the grievous literary struggle. It was a genuine disappointment to me when the butler, who was evidently in a bad humor, informed me that M. Fauchery was not in Paris. I asked when he would return. The servant did not know. What was his address? Again the servant did not know. But in spite of the domestic's incommunicativeness, half an hour later I had discovered that the novelist was living in the chateau de Proby, near Nemours. I had merely taken the trouble to inquire at his publishers.

I bought a ticket to the little city where Balzac laid the plot of his delicious "Ursule Mirouet," and just seven hours after the faithful butler had declared that he did not know where the novelist was, I was at the entrance

The Ruler of the Czar

That "Czar Nicholas rules the Russians and a monk rules Czar Nicholas" is a remark which may be heard all over Russia at present. Not since the death of John of Cronstadt had the czar an educated favorite among the clergy till Monk Theophilus was discovered in a Moscow monastery by Grand Duke Constantine. Pleased with the monk's conversation the grand duke called him to the czar's attention and ever since nobody has been closer to the imperial person. He has the right of accession to the imperial person at any time, a privilege only granted to members of the royal family and cabinet ministers. He is a daily visitor at the palace and is credited with enormous influence. Hence all seekers after patronage cultivate him and he is said to be growing wealthy on account of the gifts he receives. It is expected that the czar will soon make him a bishop.

Electricity at Tarsus

The ancient city of Tarsus in Asia Minor where the Apostle Paul was born, is now illuminated by electricity. The power is taken from the Cydnus River. Already there are 450 electric street lights and 600 incandescent lights for private use. It is proposed to extend the lighting system to the ancient towns of Adana and Mersine.

Rent, One Clover Blossom

One clover blossom a year is the rent to be charged the school board of Flint, Michigan, for a ninety-nine year lease of a school site. The owner of the land made the offer at the last meeting of the school board, stipulating that the use of the land for other than school purposes shall terminate the lease. The board will elect one of its members to pluck the clover blossom every Spring and it will be carried in procession to the donor or his heirs.

Big Champagne Loss

Owing to the unusual downpours in France it is estimated that the year's loss in the champagne grape district will be $6,000,000. For the first half of the year the precipitation has already exceeded the average annual rainfall. The rain has been falling steadily for six weeks and the weather has been very cold. The streams are full and floods are feared. The dread mildew has made its appearance in the grape country, particularly in the champagne districts and there is a general feeling of despondency. But the curtailment of the champagne crop will not prevent Americans from drinking as much of the expensive beverage as they have been in the habit of consuming.

A Rediscovered Fish

A Gloucester fishing captain arrived at New Bedford, Mass., recently with one thousand pounds of tile fish, a species supposed to have disappeared thirty or forty years ago. They are referred to as an extinct species in the latest edition of Webster's Dictionary. In the early eighties the tile fish were caught in abundance in these waters, and were considered so excellent for their food qualities that the United States Government made a special effort to locate them when they threatened to disappear. Five or six years ago the Grampus was sent out by the Fish Commission to locate the tile fish ground, but failed. Tile fish are of the deep water variety. The fish was cooked and found palatable. They are thick-meated, like codfish, with no pronounced flavor.

Pensioners Dying Fast

Soldiers and sailors of the Union Army in the Civil War are dying at a rapid rate. About ninety names a day are dropped from the pension rolls. This average is equivalent to about 2,700 deaths a month, or about 32,000 annually. The number of survivors of the Civil War on the pension rolls on June 30, 1909, was 593,961. This figure does not include widows, children or orphans. There are no pensioners of the war of 1812 living. It has been estimated that the government may pay its last Civil War pension about 1955.

Uncle Sam and a Pair of Gloves

A four-dollar pair of driving gloves for the coachman of the Secretary of State has run the gamut of official Washington scrutiny, and finally has been decreed not a proper expense for Uncle Sam to defray. The Comptroller of the Treasury, the court of last resort in such matters, has disallowed the four dollars, thus reversing the settlement of the matter by the auditor of the State Department, who had passed the item to the credit of the disbursing officer, and the disbursing officer had paid over the four dollars to the coachman. In a sharp note the Comptroller calls the auditor's attention to the disallowance of payments for clothing and livery furnished the State Department coachman eight years ago, when the government refused to pay for the coachman's "overcoat, boots, and moccasins."

Expelled for Lying

Two cadets were recently expelled from the national military academy at West Point for lying. One cadet was charged with chewing gum, the other with having citizen's clothes in his room. The punishment for either offense is comparatively light, but both cadets in trying to save themselves the annoyance of confinement to quarters denied the facts that were known. Their immediate dismissal followed. The feeling against lying is strong among the cadets and the hatred of having a liar on the class roll is so intense that if these cadets had not been expelled, their comrades would have inflicted very severe punishment upon them.

PORTLAND SAN FRANCISCO LOS ANGELES

The Spectator

Will a Negro Succeed Stanton?

Is the Honorable Philly Stanton, the man who got a wire from Roosevelt, going to be succeeded in the Assembly by a gentleman of color? Is the seat which Los Angeles' favorite son relinquished in order to do battle for the governorship to be filled by a racial brother of Jack Johnson? That is the question which is agitating the southland from San Pedro to Mount Lowe and from Saugus to Pomona Junction. George Chivis of Los Angeles is responsible for this question. George Chivis is a son of Ham; also he is a candidate for the assembly in Stanton's district. A man of influence in his district and elsewhere is George Chivis. By profession he is what is known as a "special car porter" and of this dignity there are only twenty in the United States. His leisure hours George Chivis devotes to literature, for he is the editor of "The Railway Porters' and Waiters' Magazine." That the catalogue of his excellences may not be incomplete, let me add that sartorially, tonsorially and in the matter of diamonds George Chivis is always up to, if not a little beyond the mark of gentlemanly distinction. I have heard him referred to as "some nigger" but I disdain so vulgar a phrase. As to Chivis' chance of success, it is not to be despised. Out of a total of 5,600 republican voters in his district 2,600 are of his color and previous condition of servitude. It is not premature for the other Los Angeles assemblymen to speculate on who will be seat mate to George Chivis.

Tom Phelps Was Mad

Admiral "Tom" Phelps was mad clean through the other day and expressed his indignation to a few intimates in the lobby of one of our big hotels. It seems that an article had been published in one of the morning papers stating that Admiral Harber had detailed Admiral Phelps and three junior officers to inspect the Marblehead which recently returned from a two weeks' trip to the north. What had really happened was that Admiral Phelps had applied to Admiral Harber for three junior officers to assist him in the task of inspection and they were accordingly assigned to the work. "And they talk about me being detailed to an inspection," said Phelps with flashing eye, "me, the commandante of everything from Sitka to Lower California." Truly these naval men are jealous of their rank and insistent upon the recognition of their position.

The Duffy Case

It is the power of duly appreciating the little things of life that enables us to apprehend the big ones. So let us ponder the Duffy case. The Duffy case is one of the trifles that make up the history of the graft prosecution. The spirit that created the Duffy case is typical. The morals of the Duffy case are typical. The light that the Duffy case throws on the mental processes of some of the protagonists of the graft drama is all the light that is needed for psychological study. Duffy was a janitor in the City Hall. Called as a witness before the Oliver grand jury in a matter in which he had no interest he was insulted by Francis J. Heney, and he promptly resented the insult with a blow. The grand jury promptly indicted him for this offense, but described it in the indictment as perjury for the reason, it is supposed, that battery is only a misdemeanor. Nobody ever thought of bringing Duffy to trial, but the indictment has been hanging over him through the years. When District Attorney Fickert entered upon his official duties, true to his pledge to investigate all cases and to ask for the dismissal of those that were obviously without merit, he made inquiries about the obscure Mr. Duffy. He wrote for information to his predecessor and to two of Mr. Langdon's deputies, and elicited the information that there was no case against Duffy. Mr. Fickert learned that Duffy was indicted merely for the gratification of a passing whim. He also learned that Duffy's attorney Charles Fairall had been trying for months to have the case set for trial or dismissed, but in vain the case being on Judge Lawlor's calendar. Of course everybody familiar with the designs of that particular tribunal knows that Duffy has been denied his constitutional right of trial for the purpose of passing the buck up to the Supreme Court. Judge Lawlor is harboring the grotesque delusion that there is a possibility of his being elected to that court, and the supposition is that if the justices should grant a writ of habeas corpus to anybody indicted by the Oliver grand jury they would be greatly censured. Of course Lawlor hopes to embarrass the court by imposing on it the alternative of following the law and getting abused or ignoring the law and conciliating the old graft prosecution cabal.

A Group of the Foremost

If Joe Folk of Missouri is a good judge of physiognomy it would be interesting to know what the nature of his emotions were when he met the gentlemen who constituted themselves a reception committee to do him signal honor on his arrival in this city. If all men's faces are true, whatsoever their hands are, what a singular impression must have been made on the man from Missouri as he gazed upon the legible countenances that beamed upon him, and read as he might have done those title pages of several curious human volumes. Never was illustrious patriot greeted by citizens so distinguished, so peculiarly representative of a virtuous community, embodying so many of the higher principles of social, political and commercial life, as those that extended the glad hand of welcome to the nearly favorite son of Missouri. It certainly required a keen sense of the eternal fitness of things to round up such a notable bunch of celebrities for such an occasion. Ponder the list as published appropriately by the Boughten Bulletin, the official organ of the super-righteous, and consider how closely approximating the miraculous was the felicitous grouping of these peerless men of affairs whose interests, aims, ideals, obsessions, aberrations, moral standards and temperamental propensities are absolutely identical. Never before was there so harmonious a blending of exotic personalities in one representative body. To assign preeminence to any one of them would be to discriminate unjustly against all the rest, and yet one cannot review the list without finding the name of

E. P. E. Troy sticking out like a sore thumb. Troy is saliently typical of his companions. Physically a small man, he is strikingly symbolical. In Troy we have the most active of all public spirited citizens. In all the parish there is nobody who attends to the business of others more conscientiously. He is the perennial mouthpiece of that large element for the proper designation of which it became necessary to coin a word—the troysters. Then comes Barclay Henley, job-chaser, whose resurrection during the graft prosecution was inexplicable. The mystery was solved when later he became a candidate for office again. Versed in politics as the pilot in his compass the needle points unerringly for Henley to his political interest which is his loadstar. No reception committee would be complete without Henley. His mood is always receptive. In this respect, more than any other he closely resembles the Hon. Charles Wesley Reed, the mule magnate, who assisted in making Joe Folk feel at east. Next comes Eustace Cullinan who sometimes practices journalism of the Bulletin variety, but who has for a steady diet the grist that comes from the estates of such dead men as the public administrator can get hold of. He is as truly representative of the city's best interests as Walter Macarthur, the labor agitator who is running for Congress and who stopped long enough to honor Folk. Last but not least on the list are the names of the Hon. Maurice T. Dooling and the Hon. William P. Lawlor, representatives of that section of the Bench which is made in newspaperdom and which is guaranteed to stand without tying—just outside the editorial sanctum. Mr. Folk can now return to Missouri with the assurance that he was welcomed by our best and bravest, our tried and true, the gallant band that loves majorities and never tires of working for the people.

Folk and His Ways

The Hon. Joe Folk has many admirers in San Francisco. They admire him for the indictments that he filed in St. Louis. Having filed and prosecuted a few themselves they would like to have us all feel that the ideal public servant for all purposes is the man who has tried to send men to jail. They are like the hangman who would like to see an aristocracy of hangmen and the badge of merit a skull and cross-bones. Folk is an aspirant for the presidency with his record as a prosecutor behind him. But he is not taken seriously. As a prosecutor he was a pretty decent official, his methods in nowise resembling those that were practiced in this city. Because of the good work that he did in St. Louis he was elected Governor of Missouri, and immediately he turned his eyes to the White House. In the furtherance of his own political interests he proceeded to manipulate the machinery of politics, employing the patronage of his office to carry out his designs. This is the familiar short-sighted policy of peanut politicians, and it disgusted the people of Missouri as it has disgusted people of many other States. It was Phelan's policy when he was Mayor of San Francisco, and Eugene Schmitz was the fruit thereof. It was Pardee's policy when he was Governor, and hence the general satisfaction felt upon that gentleman's return to private life. Missouri turned Joe Folk down when he solicited the vote of the people for United States Senator, and it was because of Folk that Missouri went into the Republican column.

A Mexican Monte Carlo

Editor McMullin of the San Diego Union was at the Press Club the other day renewing old acquaintances. It is not so many years since McMullin took his part in the local newspaper game, but most of his old confreres have disappeared to other fields, to other occupations or to other worlds. Not many of them have been so successful as McMullin who stands high in the confidence of John D. Spreckels and edits a good live newspaper in one of the most habitable places in the world. McMullin says that the rumor of the establishment at Tia Juana of a great gambling resort crops up persistently despite the vigorous denials of all those who are supposed to be connected with the proposition. He says that the backers of the scheme are supposed to be Los Angeles men who would be willing to accept the conditions imposed upon their enterprise by the Mexican government. I take this to mean that they would submit to a liberal "squeeze." The San Diego-Yuma railroad which is one of the Spreckels enterprises is partially built now and would enhance the value of Tia Juana as the site of a Monte Carlo, for the line crosses the American boundary in search of easy grades and passes through the little Mexican town. I reminded McMullin that when it was proposed to build a racetrack at Tia Juana after the State legislature had prohibited racetrack gambling the project was quashed by its opponents who appealed to the Mexican government. He replied that the same result might or might not be obtained today but reminded me that President Diaz cannot live much longer and that when he dies there will be a great change in Mexico.

Pinchot Disappointed

Mr. Gifford Pinchot greatly disappointed the managing directors of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League last Tuesday night. For Mr. Pinchot had filled them with great expectations and these he utterly failed to gratify. They had been led to believe that his trip to California was made for the purpose of setting off some set pieces of oratorical fireworks. They thought that Hiram Johnson's diatribes would "pale their uneffectual fires" before the burning eloquence, the pyrotechnic logic of the man who is celebrated for his surplus of approved wisdom and his command of all the platitudes of the copybook. Much to their astonishment his eloquence proved somewhat ceremonial, his arguments nothing more than incoherent and unintelligible affirmations. In his simplicity he wasn't even vehement. But Mr. Pinchot is not justly to be blamed for the insipidity of his address.

IN BULK AND IN CASES

CHARLES MEINECKE & CO.

Agents Pacific Coast SAN FRANCISCO

The explanation of it comes to me from Oakland where the forester spent a little time before favoring us with his presence. The explanation is that he was under restraint. Before starting for California he had a long conference with Colonel Theodore Roosevelt, and he was advised to be discreet, to hand out no hot stuff about the Taft administration. So there was nothing for him to talk about but conservation, and when one is a proponent of conservation it is advisable for him to deal chiefly in generalities and even these are not susceptible of a high polish.

The Irrefutable Personal Equation

The managing directors of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League were not the only persons disappointed by Mr. Pinchot's address. There were others who attended the meeting with the expectation of being enlightened on the subject of conservation. They thought that Mr. Pinchot would tell them just what it means, and in doing so that he would refute the arguments of the lowbrows who say that it means locking up our resources and depriving the western State of their means of development. But Mr. Pinchot is a forester, not a controversialist. He is also a moralist, a patriot and a prophet of conservation. And it was in these diverse capacities that he addressed his audience. Therefore he did not consider it necessary to do anything more than give his personal assurance of the virtue and soundness of the thing he advocates. Thus, as may be learned from the stenographic report of his utterances, after quoting the enemies of conservation respecting the distribution of revenues from the sale of timber, he pronounced their views "nonsense" and completely demolished their arguments in these impressive words: "If you ask me how I know, I know because before what has been euphemistically called my resignation I was chief of the forestry service. You cannot fool me; I know better." This is a delicious sample of the conservation of Mr. Pinchot's mental resources. It reminds me of Hudibras:

> "We grant altho' he had much wit,
> He was very shy of using it."

Also:

> He knew what's what, and that's as high
> As metaphysic wit can fly.

The Irrefragable Ipse Dixit

The fact is that Mr. Pinchot knows the whole truth about conservation but regards it as "too rich a pearl for carnal swine." Hence the overwhelming force of his ipse dixit. Again I quote from the stenographic report of his speech: "Whenever anyone tells you that conservation means tying up any of the national resources, or means preventing this generation from its full or right share, or means taking away from the State of California the resources to which it has a right you give him my compliments and tell him it is not so." Who would be so discourteous as to reject Mr. Pinchot's compliments, or so unreasonable as to demand other proof on the subject of conservation?

His Tameness Appreciated

Not all of the managing directors of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League are dissatisfied with the Pinchot address. Some there are that were in a cold perspiration during his speech; for they feared that he might say something offensive about President Taft, and they were much pleased that he did not do so. These gentlemen were lately instrumental in having a bridle put on Hiram Johnson's tongue, the reason being that they fear he has alienated many voters who believe that his election would seriously embarrass this city in its efforts to get the World's Fair. They realize that the whole State is interested in the Fair project, and they have heard that in many towns there has been discussion of the proposition that it would be very foolish to elect to the gubernatorial office a man who has wantonly insulted the President to whom we are looking for sympathy and assistance. Many of Johnson's supporters are earnestly hoping that by election day it will have been forgotten that some of his choicest diatribes have been directed against President Taft.

Spalding for Senator

When out of San Diego came the news that at the eleventh hour Mr. A. G. Spalding had yielded to the importunities of his friends and become a candidate for the United States Senate many of Judge Works' boomers threw up their hands. Though the judge has never been regarded as a strong candidate, there was such a scarcity of senatorial timber in sight that his friends thought it likely he would get the popular vote through lack of opposition. But with A. G. Spalding in the race there is not much hope for Works. Even the managing directors of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League will not deny that such is the case; nor are they profoundly concerned, for Works has never been able to excite their enthusiasm. Spalding is assured of support from all elements and all factions. Personally he is a man of great magnetism, and it is doubtful whether another man could be found capable of rendering greater service to the State in Washington. For Spalding's influence is not confined to California. He has very large interests in the Middle West, and he numbers among his most intimate friends several members of the Senate and President Taft himself. I believe that in consenting to become a candidate he was influenced as much by his friends in Washington as by those in San Diego, where, by the way, he has lived for many years and where he is regarded as the most public spirited citizen in all the State.

A Tribute to Frank Bacon

Local theatergoers who for years have enjoyed the work of Frank Bacon at the Alcazar and elsewhere will rejoice to learn that he has made a great hit in the fine role of the druggist in the Chicago production of "The Fortune Hunter." Johnson Briscoe writing in one of the August magazines of the men and women who have made personal hits during the past season has this to say of our old friend: "During a recent visit to Chicago,

I had many people ask me, 'Who is Frank Bacon?' and it seemed a surprising thing that an actor with over twenty-five years' experience should be so little known. However, this is merely a local condition, with specific reference to the east, for there is no actor better known than Bacon on the Pacific Coast. For over twenty and more years he has confined his talents exclusively to that portion of the map, chiefly to the stock companies of San Francisco, and though he has had frequent overtures to venture upon eastern soil, he has always remained steadfast to the Golden Gate. But now that 'The Fortune Hunter' has brought him as far east as Chicago, mayhap New Yorkers will yet become conversant with the finished, ripe art of Frank Bacon."

Others Who Have Scored

Frank Bacon is only one of the Californians who have made great personal hits during the past theatrical season in the East. So many of the country's best players have been identified with the drama in this city that it is bromidic to insist upon our capacity for turning out theatrical geniuses. But at the risk of being accounted a vain-glorious boaster I am going to cull from this same article a partial list of the players from San Francisco who have scored on Broadway during the past year. At the top of the list stands Nance O'Neil who electrified New York one night in "The Lily." Then comes Tully Marshall who like Nance O'Neil was born in this section and who gathered most of the honors in the posthumous production of Clyde Fitch's "The City." Merle Maddern is another of our girls. In "The Bridge" and "The Pillars of Society" she made such a deep impression on the critics that they prophesied the most brilliant future for her. Eugenie Thais Lawton got her start at the Alcazar and the Central. Now she is a distinguished member of the New Theater company and is highly regarded particularly for her work in "Strife" and "Don." Ernest Glendenning is another player who learned most of his art at the Alcazar; he has been making the easterners sit up by the support which he has given Amelia Gardner in one of the Belasco productions. This is not a complete list, but it is interesting because all the names it contains have been bracketted by the Broadway managers. Previous to last season the Broadway managers would have been worse than indifferent to them.

How About the Conduit System?

The newspapers and politicians that have been looking forward for years to that darling consummation—a municipal street railroad—repeatedly told us that one of their benign purposes was that of illustrating the charms of the conduit system. We heard a great deal about the conduit system. It was something that we should have all over town. It was an outrage to permit the operation of the ugly trolley system which was not only offensive to lovers of the beautiful but a constant menance to life and property. Of course the officials of the public-service corporation would have the people believe that the conduit system was impracticable. And of course they were liars; couldn't tell the truth; the trolley system was cheaper than the conduit and that was the only reason why they reared poles and strung live and dangerous wires all over town. "We'll show 'em," said the Examiner and the troysters; "just wait till we get busy on Geary street." Now there is nothing more to be heard with reference to a conduit system. We are not to have any conduit system. Nobody would take the responsibility of experimenting with a conduit system. The Examiner which knows that the conduit system is a failure in Washington, D. C., wouldn't dare sponsor a conduit system. So the first step to be taken in municipal ownership will not be in accordance with promise; nor will the second; nor will any subsequent step.

"James, can I trust you with the key to the wine cellar?"

The Irresponsible Lord Douglas

Americans take more or less interest in Lord Alfred Douglas because he has never forgiven Washington and New York society for snubbing him after the Oscar Wilde exposure and never misses an opportunity in his weekly paper, the Academy of London, to vent his spleen at everything connected with this country. It would seem that Lord Douglas is not popular at home either. Quite recently H. G. Wells, the novelist, was attacked in the Academy and responded with a sizzling letter. He charged Douglas with garbling statements which he made. In reference to Douglas' criticism of "Mr. Polly" he says: "The little streak of something very like insanity with which you introduce sexual considerations to your readers was never quite so evident." He speaks of Douglas as "inserting unwarrantable corruptions into an author's most innocent intentions." The letter has aroused a great deal of excitement and Wells has been

Edwards Davis No Daniel

Edwards Davis who is scintillating with Wilde epigrams at the Orpheum once missed an excellent opportunity for widespread publicity. As Davis is usually to the fore when such opportunities present themselves the story is worth recalling. It was at the time of the old Haight street Chutes when Adgie and her lions furnished thrills to the groundlings. The management thought it would be a great drawing card if a wedding could be held in the lions' cage, so an impecunious couple was found—Heaven knows where—who were willing to be spliced within reach of the lions' jaws. Then an unexpected difficulty presented itself. Where could a clergyman be found to do the splicing? This knotty problem was dismissed when the press representative of the Chutes bethought him of the Reverend Edwards Davis, Oakland's sensational pulpit-pounder. The Reverend Davis was approached, offered a tempting honorarium and agreed to perform the ceremony with the gaping lions within the cage and the gaping multitude without. But when the great night came and Davis saw those lions stalking up and down the cage and heard their terrific roars, he changed his mind. The curtain was about to go up on the wedding ceremony when Davis approached the stage manager and with his best bow said: "Sir, I regret to say that I have changed my mind for two reasons. In the first place, I am no Daniel and in the second place the age of miracles is past."

Miss Victoria, a Correction

From what I regarded as an authoritative source I received last week a statement to the effect that Miss Vesta Victoria had failed to contribute to the funeral expenses of an unfortunate vaudeville artist and to the relief of his widow. I learn that I have done Miss Victoria an injustice which I hasten to undo. Mr. James Finney, manager of the Mermaids who were at the Orpheum recently, writes to me that he collected the fund in question and that Miss Victoria personally handed to him $25 at the Hotel St. Mark in Oakland. Mr. Finney says that he believes that this was the largest single donation to the fund.

A Model Public Servant

To Alfred Roncovieri, Superintendent of Schools, more than to any other individual is due the credit for having induced the National Education Association to hold its annual convention in this city next year. This convention will be attended by thirty thousand teachers. Which reminds me that some days ago I read in a daily paper an editorial advocating the election of somebody who wants to be Superintendent of Schools and affirming as the one reason of Roncovieri's unworthiness the circumstance of his having been identified with the Schmitz administration. It occurred to me that this was a rather ugly specimen of dishonest journalism. For while it may be inferred that almost everybody connected with the Schmitz administration should be regarded with suspicion, there is not a newspaper in San Francisco unaware of the fact that it is greatly to Roncovieri's credit that notwithstanding his environment, notwithstanding the allegiance that he owed and bravely kept even in the darkest hours, he never suffered a stain to be put upon his administration, and performed his duties with clean hands. Roncovieri's political career I have watched with some interest and not a little curiosity. For though not a professional educator he has devoted himself to educational work, displaying exceptional enthusiasm and ability in his office and greatly improving our school department. It was Roncovieri that introduced our present civil service system for the selection of teachers which more than all else removed the schools from the influence of politics. He has encouraged technical training, he has interested himself in the welfare of children and made it generally understood that schools are primarily for the benefit of children. His office has been conducted on business principles, and the tone and general character of the schools have improved under his administration.

Two Rumored Engagements

Once more am I forced to drape my engagement announcements under the trappings of anonymity. It is awkward not to be able to tell the names of those who are about to capitulate to Dan Cupid, but dire necessity sometimes makes it imperative. When a tender secret is whispered under solemn vow of secrecy what is one going to do? I am perfectly aware that "as waggish boys in game themselves forswear, so the boy Love is perjured everywhere," but while Jove may laugh at these lovers' perjuries he frowns on the perjuries of lovers' friends and I am going to keep my vows. But there is no reason why I should not tell all that can be told in default of naming names. Well then, one forthcoming engagement is between a girl in her very early teens who is at present visiting Colorado Springs with her family and a young man in the real estate and insurance business who enjoyed the reputation of being one of the best fancy-step skaters at the Monday Night Skating Club over which Mrs. Inez Shorb White Buck so gracefully presided. I wonder if you know who I mean? If you do, mum's the word. Another engagement will link a beautiful young girl who resides in Pacific avenue and spends most of her summers in Blythedale and Mill Valley to a bright young man who recently returned from a well-known law college in the East and is now embarking on the stormy sea of practice. These two made a very interesting couple at luncheon at the Palace a few days ago, but their devotion on that occasion was not unduly conspicuous. Has not their love stood the test of two years' separation?

A French Restaurant Escapade

When a well known member of several local clubs died some time ago there was great speculation among his friends as to the cause of his taking off. An attack of pneumonia from which he was said to have suffered and from which he never entirely recovered was given by many as the reason but others pretended to know better. A pistol shot in a French restaurant escapade was their startling explanation of his death. It is a melodramatic story in which figure a joy-riding wife and an irate husband. The husband is frequently away from home on flying business trips to fair Southern California and during his absences the joy-riding wife seeks diversion. The husband was led to suspect that she did so and he set a trap. He announces his departure for Los Angeles. Enter the hero who arranges a little dinner with the wife to relieve her loneliness. They are cosily discussing cold bottles and such things in a secluded apartment of a certain restaurant when there is a knock at the door. Fortunately the latch is caught, and the knock is unheeded. Then the voice of the husband demands admittance. Consternation of wife and hero who however has presence of mind enough to switch off the lights. The husband attempts to force an entrance and the hero decides to beat it. He flings the door open and rushes by the irate husband who turns a revolver on him and fires, but without recognizing his victim. The shot pierces the hero's lungs, but he continues his flight and at the foot of the stairway at the street entrance he dashes full into a policeman. Here his presence of mind again serves him. "Hurry up," he gasps, "there's a man shot up there—I'm running for a doctor," and he continues running while the half dazed minion of the law proceeds to the scene above. Leaving the situation there to adjust itself and following the hero we find him safe at home telephoning for a physician, who arrives with a nurse. The next day friends learn of his sudden attack of pneumonia from which in time he recovers and the incident is closed. There should be a sequel disclosing the joy-riding wife's opinion of the hero but his death makes it unnecessary to dwell on these comparatively unimportant details of the sensational affair.

The Etiquette of Lady Smokers

For all the professed disapproval of feminine smoking and shocked denial of its spread society women who do not smoke are a small minority. Most of the young matrons of the Burlingame set have cigarettes made to order, rolled in monogrammed papers and they are of a size to fit into dainty silver cases easily carried. Smoking at afternoon bridge parties is customary although usually the smokers are gathered in one apartment while tables for the prejudiced are arranged in another room. Should one of the former find herself misplaced among the old-fashioned guests it would be, by some unwritten but understood law, a shocking breach to produce tobacco even though in an adjoining room the air is blue. And should one who like little Robert Reed would not use the filthy weed, wander among the nicotine ladies the volume of smoke would not be reduced. At a small affair where the guests are all of the same set no such division occurs and smoking is general. The parties at which there is no smoking belong in another class.

An Interesting Coincidence

I notice that on Wednesday Mrs. J. F. Sullivan entertained in her beautifully renovated Pacific avenue home in honor of Mrs. Edward Eberle, the charming wife of Lieutenant Commander Edward Eberle, U. S. N. This reminds me of a very interesting coincidence. There are now in California three lieutenant commanders who took their brides from the same house in San Francisco. At the time of their marriages all were young ensigns, just starting out on their naval careers. Their brides were all related and the weddings were among the most brilliant of those colorful days. The three lieutenant commanders in question are Lieutenant Commander Eberle, Lieutenant Commander Knapp and Lieutenant Commander Glennon. All early Californians remember the hospitable home of the Randolph Harrisons where entertainments were splendid and continuous. The Randolph Harrisons had two charming daughters, Tazie and Lillie, and had adopted two orphan nieces, Susie Blair and Elsie Allen. These four girls were the favorites of society, for in addition to beauty they possessed witty, vivacious and variously cultivated minds. Tazie Harrison married Ensign Eberle, Lillie Harrison married Ensign Knapp, Susie Blair married Ensign Glennon and Elsie Allen married John Leicester who, like the young naval officers, was on the threshold of a brilliant career, in his case the career of a lawyer. It is strange that after all these years these commanders should once more be gathered with their wives in California.

Items the Bavardes Missed

The wedding of Miss Broadway and Captain Marine will be an event of the Fall. It is a matter of indifference to most people that Captain Marine will take his bride to Mars to live.

The unfortunate prize-winners at Mrs. Highstakes' bridge party Thursday afternoon were Mrs. Goodplayer, Mrs. Betterhands and Miss Score. They were much disappointed with the useless silk bags bestowed on them but were somewhat compensated by their winnings. After the games several friends came in for gin-fizzes and cigarettes.

Arthur Holdover was host last evening at an informal supper party which was one of the most disgraceful affairs of the season.

Brass buttons were much in evidence at the Presidio hop Friday evening. They were attached to uniforms worn by a number of officers present.

The Thomas Thompson Tompkins are motoring through England after spending a month miserably in London where they were socially ignored.

Miss Isabelle Rising who was one of the most prominent belles in the newspaper columns last winter will go abroad for the summer. On her return she will again be advertised. Miss Rising is possessed of a rare determination which was much admired by her friends last season.

The Assembly last evening was not a brilliant success. Many beautiful gowns were worn and there was a dearth of dancing men, most of those present deserting the ballroom for the bar. The decorations were of wall-flowers and evergreens. At midnight a skimpy supper was served and afterwards dancing was kept up with difficulty until a late hour. The patronesses received no congratulations on the failure of the affair.

The climbing McClymonds have taken a place in Ross Park where they hope to secure a social footing. Miss Marguerite McClymonds will be one of the uninteresting debutantes of next winter.

Mr. and Mrs. Owen Moore will spend the summer in town because they can't afford to go to the country this year.

The death of William Miser occurred during the week and no sympathy is felt for Mrs. Miser who will enjoy the period of her mourning abroad.

Miss Jennie Crocker's Trunks

At the opening performance of Miss Henrietta Crosman at the Columbia the box in which Miss Jennie Crocker sat was the focus for all the opera glasses in the theater. A pretty picture indeed did Miss Crocker make and there was nothing in her expressive countenance to betray her consciousness of the mob's attention. As I walked down Geary street after the performance a couple of baggage smashers were unloading a dozen trunks at the St. Francis. Just then I overheard this conversation between a sweet young thing and her tall good-looking escort. She: I wonder whose trunks those are arriving at this late hour? He: Why, Jennie Crocker's, of course. She ran up from Santa Barbara tonight to see the show and those trunks contain a few little things she will want to wear before she goes back after breakfast.

D'Abruzzi's Failure

It seems to be settled that Miss Katherine Elkins will keep a great fortune in the United States by bestowing her hand, her heart and her millions on Billy Hitt of Washington. In other words the Duke of the Abruzzi will not crown his sensational wooing by carrying off the desire of his heart to an Italian palazzo. This of course is very gratifying to those of us who regard international alliances with horror on account of the amount of money which they take out of this country, but speaking for myself I confess to a different sentiment. I am sorry that Miss Elkins gave d'Abruzzi his conge, provided that was what happened. That may not be what happened at all. It may be that Miss Elkins was perfectly willing to become an Italian duchess but that the laws of Italy restrained the duke from marrying outside of his own rank. At all events I am sorry that d'Abruzzi failed in his wooing, whether his ill success was based on Almanach de Gotha considerations or the predilection of the young lady. Of all the foreign noblemen who have come a-wooing to America none has so interested my imagination as this Italian. He is a man of achievement, a scientists, a writer and an explorer. With every temptation toward a life of ease he has preferred the strenuous existence of the sea and mountain tops. To class him with the fortune-hunting degenerates who have so often captured American heiresses is to be guilty of the utmost folly. There isn't an American girl living who should not feel honored by the addresses of such a man. So I am not entirely gratified that Miss Elkins has decided to become Mrs. Billy Hitt.

Tessie and Nordica at Outs

Secure in the assumption that any bit of news about the many-sided Mrs. Tessie Oelrichs will prove of interest to many of my readers I hasten to record the fact that she no longer includes Madame Nordica in her list of friends. The cause of this estrangement is a mystery. The friendship between the Newport widow and the song bird was a short and merry one; begun with the suddenness of caprice, it as swiftly came to an end. There are some who say that Mrs. Oelrichs found Madame Nordica's latest husband impossible. There are others who say that Madame Nordica's latest husband objected to Mrs. Oelrichs. So there you are. At any rate when the person in question who is Mr. George W. Young, built his song bird a beautiful summer cage on the Jersey Coast, Mrs. Oelrichs was conspicuously absent from the housewarming. If her cordial feeling toward Madame Nordica-Young still continued she need not have feared to attend. Granted that the Jersey Coast is intensely bourgeoise, still Mrs. Oelrichs has too strong a position at Newport to be afraid of being seen there. The whole affair is very complicated, especially as Madame Nordica seems to have become almost as cold toward her latest husband as toward Mrs. Oelrichs. She has suddenly decided that she dislikes the Jersey Coast and that she can lose a little avoirdupois by a trip to the German baths. And she has gone without her husband. Eccentric indeed are these grand opera stars. Henceforth, says malicious gossip at Newport, Mrs. Oelrichs will have to pay for her musical talent.

Mrs. Beveridge's Disappointment

An occasional correspondent who drops me a line about Washington officialdom says that the plight of Senator Beveridge who is so fearful of being returned to private life that he has enlisted the assistance of Colonel Roosevelt in his campaign, has revived a story which was told at the time of the marriage of the Hoosier Demosthenes. It runs to the effect that when the frock-coated Cicero from Indianapolis asked for the hand of Miss Catherine Eddy, the young lady's mother, now dead, sternly narrated all the claims of the house of Eddy and named its coupons present and prospective. Then she asked: "What have you to offer my daughter in return for all this?" To which the boy-statesman made answer: "I can lead her straight to the White House, to reign as the most attractive of all its lovely mistresses." The story goes that Mrs. Eddy wept with joy and gave her blessing. But now the road to the White House presents all sorts of obstacles and Beveridge will be very glad to retain his seat in the Senate. This condition of affairs, my correspondent says, has caused Mrs. Beveridge a great deal of disappointment.

The Making of an Actress

Frank Gould is to star his new wife in a musical comedy the despatches tell us. And they also tell us that the lady is an actress. How easy it is nowadays for a woman to become an "actress"! With the slightest and most limited acquaintance with the stage a woman becomes an actress in the newspapers as soon as she figures in a scandal or something sensational. This Edith Kelly to whom Gould was married in Paris was one of the chorus in "The Girls of Gottenburg" which had a short run at the Knickerbocker in New York. Then she was seen in "Havana" at the Casino and then she completed the routine by marrying Gould.

Bohemian Club Concert

The regular after-the-Jinks concert of the Bohemian Club will take place at the Van Ness Theater on Tuesday afternoon, August 9. A program of unusual excellence will be presented, embracing selections from a number of the recent forest plays presented at the club's open air theater in its Grove near Guerneville. The feature of the program will naturally be the music from this year's Jinks—"The Cave Man," music by W. J. McCoy, words by Charles K. Field. The orchestra will be directed by the various composers, including Joseph D. Redding, Edmund F. Schneider, G. G. Stricklen and Herman Perlet. The club's chorus will be directed by E. D. Crandall. The concert will be under the general direction of the following committee of club members: Willard T. Barton, chairman, Joseph D. Redding, W. H. Leahy, John C. Wilson and Charles S. Aiken.

Month of Sports at Del Monte

One of the interesting features of the coming month of sports at Hotel Del Monte will be the battle for tennis supremacy between George Janes and Melville Long, the present and former champions. So expert are these players and so evenly matched that each has been victorious over the other on two occasions, each has twice won the Del Monte Cup and the contest this year will settle the championship decisively and give the winner the actual ownership of the cup. The management of the Pacific States Lawn Tennis Association is also preparing to have a number of new events which will appeal to all classes of players. Members of the various golf clubs of the Pacific Coast are looking forward to the coming tournament at Hotel Del Monte with great interest. Many of the clubs of Southern California and of Washington and Oregon have signified their intention of sending their best players to participate.

The Popular Hotel Victoria

There are indications that the pendulum of hotel management is swinging backward to the American plan as distinguished from the European. One of our big hostelries recently announced that it would soon provide its guests with both systems of entertainment. This naturally calls attention to the hotels which already have the American plan and in this list the Hotel Victoria is prominent. Under the capable management of Mrs. Morris the Victoria occupies an important position in local hoteldom. Many of our socially prominent people make it their permanent home while others choose it as the best place for their various afternoon and evening functions. Careful management has won for the Victoria the appreciation of our best people.

In the Social Spotlight

In the death of Mrs. Margaret Kyle Foulkes on July 14 one of California's best beloved women has passed away. Mrs. Foulkes was a native of North Carolina and but recently passed her eightieth birthday. Her husband, the late Dr. James F. Foulkes, was a noted physician here in early days. He and his wife came from the South and settled in Oakland where the family were prominent in business and exclusive social circles. Although Mrs. Foulkes had been an invalid for many years her death came suddenly, the saddest part being that both of her daughters, Mrs. William T. Renison (May Foulkes), wife of Rev. W. T. Renison of Stockton, and Mrs. J. Mora Moss (Margaret Foulkes), wife of Dr. J. Mora Moss of this city were unable to reach the bedside of their mother before she breathed her last.

One of the many motor parties of last week included Mr. and Mrs. J. Forest Wyman, Mrs. M. McLaughlin, Miss May McLaughlin, all of San Francisco, and Mrs. R. Schen of Ross, who will be at Del Monte for some time enjoying the scenic drives.

Mrs. John C. Wilson was a luncheon hostess Thursday at the St. Francis in honor of Miss Virginia Jolliffe. Entertaining at nearby tables were P. McG. McBean, Laurance I. Scott, Mrs. J. Parker Whitney and Mrs. Landers.

Among the army officers registered at the Palace are Captain C. R. Day and Mrs. Day, Captain G. P. Moore and Mrs. Moore, Captain Nelson Gapin and Mrs. Gapin, Captain J. B. Hutchinson and Mrs. Hutchison, Lieutenant R. E. Grimsted and Mrs. Grimsted, Lieutenant J. D. Elliot and Mrs. Elliot, Captain George D. Moore and Mrs. Moore, Captain Thomas J. Fox and Mrs. Fox, Lieutenant M. T. McCaughey and Mrs. McCaughey.

The army set was pleased to greet Major Samuel W. Dunning and his attractive wife during the week, when they arrived on the transport Sherridan from Honolulu. They will remain at the Fairmont during their stay in town. Major Dunning is in command of Fort Shafter and is a favorite in his regiment, the Twentieth Infantry, as well as in Honolulu society. Several social affairs will be given in honor of Mrs. Dunning during their stay in town.

Miss Jennie Crocker who is spending the summer in Santa Barbara came north to attend the dog show in which she is exhibiting several of her pets. She will return to the Potter next week. Templeton Crocker who accompanied his sister north returned to Santa Barbara the first of the week.

Recent San Francisco arrivals at the Hotel del Coronado included: Mr. and Mrs. C. W. Rogers, Mr. and Mrs. C. F. Runyon, Miss Helen Runyon, Mr. and Mrs. William Smeltie, George S. Garritt, Lon C. Swain, Mrs. J. R. Winn, R. B. Winn, Master Win, Mrs. Jules Paget, Mr. and Mrs. Victor Reiter and son, J. J. McGinnis, Jay D. Adams and George A. Johnson.

Lieutenant and Mrs. George Ruhleen Jr. went down this week from the Presidio of San Francisco to spend a few weeks at the Vendome in San Jose.

The moonlight and searchlight bathing party which took place in front of the Casino at Santa Cruz Monday night was quite a novel affair. Two brass bands played. Promptly at eight-thirty about three score bathers took a dip in the bay and with the moonlight on the water, and the searchlight playing upon these bathers, it was really a very beautiful sight. About a dozen ladies and gentlemen went to the raft. Individual swimmers were singled out by the searchlight, and the bay between the pier and the lifeline was dotted with swimmers.

In the list of arrivals at Aetna Springs from San Francisco are: Mr. and Mrs. R. E. Queen, Miss M. Queen, Mrs. F. N. Woods, Miss M. Woods, Dr. and Mrs. Birtch, Dr. and Mrs. Sullivan and son, Mr. and Mrs. W. B. Lewitt, Mr. and Mrs. W. F. Andruss, Mrs. H. Hess, Mrs. H. Adler, E. A. Scharlach, G. J. Scharlach, Miss Gertrude Baker, Geo. R. Gay, A. H. Ahlers, Mr. and Mrs. A. L. Demek, Emil Hedine, Mr. and Mrs. E. A. Demoulin, Mr. and Mrs. C. B. Hobson, Miss Bernice Hobson, Mr. and Mrs. A. T. Phillips, Miss Dottibee Latham, Mr. and Mrs. C. C. Morris, J. C. Seagrave, J. McC. Anderson, Chas. D. Smith, Mr. and Mrs. Jas. Young, Miss Young, Miss Elsie Young, Arthur Meyer and Carl H. Schmidt.

After Miss Anglin's play Wednesday night Mrs. Andrew Welch gave a supper in the brown room of the Potter Hotel, seventeen guests partaking of her hospitality. The supper was informal in its character and the young people thoroughly enjoyed it.

Captain C. W. Exton, Thirteenth Infantry, U. S. A., is visiting General John McClellan at the Vendome in San Jose.

Mr. C. A. Snyder went down from the city Saturday bringing with him in his car Mr. F. Perkes, also of San Francisco, and Mr. and Mrs. J. McCarteny of Butte, stopping at the Vendome.

Mrs. Laurance I. Scott was hostess at a pretty luncheon at the St. Francis last Wednesday, entertaining a number of Burlingame friends. Among them were Mrs. Peter Martin, Mrs. Walter Martin and Miss Jennie Crocker.

Ogden Mills Jr., grandson and heir of the late D. O. Mills, stopped several days at the Palace on his return from the "scrap" at Reno. Mills lost $5,000 on the "late unpleasantness" but refused to do much talking about it.

A jolly motor party from Los Angeles spending several days at the Palace was that of Miss Kate C. Conaty, a sister of Archbishop Conaty of the Los Angeles diocese. Miss Conaty's guests were Miss McDermott and Miss Lynch, also of Los Angeles.

Mr. and Mrs. George Newhall of San Francisco gave a dinner at the Potter Country Club last Tuesday night when covers were laid for twelve San Francisco fashionables.

Mr Mackaye in Illustrious Company

Wherein is Advanced the Thesis That in Satirizing his Fellow Dramatists the Author of "Anti-Matrimony" is Wasting His Time, with Some Illustrations from the History of the Stage

By Edward F. O'Day

Aristophanes, Shakespeare, Buckingham, Fielding, Sheridan and Percy MacKaye! There's a list to whet the curiosity of the literary idler, a galaxy of dramatic authors illumining some paltry thousand years, a collocation of names which, to say the very least, ought to earn for me the warm gratitude of Mr. MacKaye, for I doubt whether he has ever been included in such illustrious company before. Let me hasten to say that the list is not critically but historically arranged. There was no question of merit involved in its compilation. It is merely a list, as nearly complete a list as my recollection enables me to assemble, of the dramatists who have satirized or made fun of the drama. Mr. MacKaye belongs in this list by virtue of his latest play, "Anti-Matrimony." Not that "Anti-Matrimony" is worthy of comparison with any play of Aristophanes or Shakespeare or Sheridan. Mr. MacKaye, I am sure, would no more thank me for so preposterous a comparison than, though for quite a different reason, he would for bracketting him in critical fashion with Buckingham and Fielding, the remaining two members of our illustrious sextet. But Mr. MacKaye has attempted in "Anti-Matrimony" the same thing that was tried by his five predecessors with varying success. This attempt gives "Anti-Matrimony" an historical interest which, as far as I am concerned, so outweighs its purely dramatic interest that I am impelled to consider it as a link in a chain extending far beyond the inception of this our Christian era. The first link of this chain was forged by Aristophanes when he wrote "The Frogs," a brilliant dramatic satire in which Euripides whose "droppings of warm tears" were the scorn of his comic rival, was held up to the ridicule of the Athenian public. It was a powerful assault and no doubt it embarrassed the tragic writer, but today the cruel wit of Aristophanes is less esteemed than the tender humanity of Euripides. Shakespeare forged several links to bridge the intervening centuries when he burlesqued the ranting tirades which passed for tragic eloquence with Kyd, Lyly, Marlowe and others of his immediate predecessors. This he did, as we all remember, in "Love's Labor Lost," "Hamlet" and particularly in "The Midsummer Night's Dream" where Nick Bottom, Peter Quince and their stout company presented "Pyramus and Thisbe." There is delicious fooling in this interlude but it does not depend on the satire of crude playwrights who have gone their way to oblivion. Who now reads "The Rehearsal"? Who today or tomorrow could conveniently put his hand upon a copy of it? (If anybody, I would gladly know, for I have not seen it since my copy perished in 1906.) Yet "The Rehearsal" was not the least distinguished achievement of Villiers, second duke of Buckingham. When it was produced Dryden was at the height of his dramatic career, a commanding figure, the poet laureate, the favorite of his king, but so witty was the satire of the noble amateur that all London laughed at his likeness drawn in the character of Bayes and Louis XIV wanted Colbert (his Buckingham) to write him a play! There were other dramatists burlesqued in "The Rehearsal," nobodies like Crowne, Shadwell and Etherege. Their plays are today as dead as Dryden's, but not on account of Buckingham's satire, for their popularity was by no means knocked on the head by his palpable hits. If "The Rehearsal" is the third link in the chain which we are taking the liberty to rivet to Mr. Percy MacKaye, "Tom Thumb the Great" is the fourth. This was a jeux d'esprit by the fun-loving author of "Tom Jones." If there was ever a time when it might have been piously hoped that satire would slay a few score playwrights that time was Fielding's. The biographies give us the distinct impression that along every high road to London ambitious poets were advancing six or eight abreast with a tragedy in one pocket of their great coats and a letter to some patron in the other. They were as great a pest to managers and public as the dogs of Stamboul to a bare-legged pedestrian. The best of their plays were dreary enough—witness Addison's "Cato"—and the worst were atrocious—witness Sam Johnson's "Irene." But did "Tom Thumb" do bloody execution among them? Not a bit of it. Its great distinction is that it made Swift laugh, and the dolorous dean only laughed twice in his life. Only one line of that Fielding satire is remembered now: "Oh Huncamunca, Huncamunca oh!" and that was a sly dig at a play of James Thomson's which was damned at the end of the second act! Perhaps the reader perceives that I am endeavoring to establish a thesis as to the futility of dramatic satire, that I am trying to insinuate for Mr. MacKaye's benefit that in sharpening his razor of wit—a barbarous figure!—for the throats of Ibsen and Suderman, Nietzsche and Maeterlinck, he is wasting his time. Well, that was the thought that came to me as I fidgeted through "Anti-Matrimony" and that is what I am trying to convey. But the bright link of my chain which is closest to Mr. MacKaye seems to tumble my thesis in the dust. Sheridan's "The Critic" marks the highest achievement in this dramatic-satirical field. If we are to believe certain writers it attained the end of satire by shaming inferior performances from the stage. And yet I have my doubts. Great as "The Critic" is, it is not easy to point to any dramatic change it wrought, for better or worse. But granting that there is room for argument in the case of Sheridan—and I assume that there is none in the others I have cited—it remains to be said that "Anti-Matrimony" is not another "Critic." Let me apply to it the celebrated sentence which Sam Johnson passed on "The Rehearsal": "It has not wit enough to keep it sweet; it has not vitality enough to preserve it from putrefaction."

The Large Cigar

You lie on the oaken mantel shelf
  A cigar of high degree,
And old cigar, a large cigar,
  A cigar that was given to me.
The houseflies bite you day by day—
  Bite you, and kick, and sigh—
And I do not know what the insects say.
  But they creep away and die.

My friends they take you gently up,
  And lay you gently down;
They never saw a weed so big,
  Or quite so deadly brown.
They, as a rule, smoke anything
  They pick up free of charge;
But they leave you to rest while the bulbuls sing
  Through the night, my own, my large!

The dust lies thick on your bloated form,
  And the year draws to its close,
And the baccy jar's been emptied—by
  My laundress, I suppose.
Smokeless and hopeless, with reeling brain,
  I turn to the oaken shelf,
And take you down, while my hot tears rain,
  And smoke you, you brute, myself

Stage

Hackett in "The Prisoner of Zenda"

James K. Hackett in "The Prisoner of Zenda" is the exceptionally strong attraction announced by the Alcazar management for the coming week. It was as Rudolph Rassendyl that Mr. Hackett leaped into stellar prominence about fifteen years ago, and since then he has played the part so well and so often and in so many places that the American people have come to regard him as its only true exponent. Many of those who witnessed him in the role more than a decade ago at the Baldwin Theater have served to keep the great performance in San Francisco's memory, and its revival at the Alcazar promises to be his most profitable offering in that playhouse. Mr. Hackett will have splendid acting support. Beatrice Beckley, his leading woman, is said to be a most charming Flavia, and Arthur Hoops, his leading man, has played Rupert of Hentzau so many times that he and the star are even more effective in their team work than they were in that great third act of "Samson." Fred J. Butler will appear as Colonel Sapt, Will R. Walling as Black Michael, Louise Brownell as Antoinette and Catherine Calhoun as Amelia, with the remainder of the regular company and many extra people rounding out the cast.

Annette Kellerman at the Orpheum

Annette Kellerman, one of the greatest vaudeville attractions in the world, has been secured by the Orpheum Circuit for a brief tour and will make her first appearance in this city next Sunday matinee. Miss Kellerman is the champion swimmer and diver of the wrold. She holds records from 100 yards to 26 miles and is the only girl that ever attempted to cross the English Channel. She has won every race she ever entered and has defeated most of the best male swimmers in the world. Professor Dudley Sargent, physical instructor of Harvard University, proclaimed her the most perfectly built woman in existence. Her two remarkable dives are named "The Front Back" and "Dolphin." Miss Kellerman's exhibition of fancy diving is preceded by a game of Diabolo. She won the Diabolo championship in Paris last season. Clifford & Burke, who are among the leading exponents of black face comedy in vaudeville, will contribute a touch of minstrelsy to the new bill. The Four Cliftons who will make their first appearance here are renowned European equilibrists. Harry Atkinson, the Australian Orpheus, comes direct from London to introduce his imitations of musical instruments. Next week will be the final one of James Thornton, The Imperial Musicians, Prof. Apdale's Zoo Circus and Edwards Davis and his company in "The Picture of Dorian Gray."

A Blanche Bates' Play at Ye Liberty

For the week commencing next Monday evening, the second week of Izetta Jewel's special season with his company, Manager Bishop of Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, announces a revival of "Under Two Flags," the celebrated romantic drama made from Ouida's immensely popular novel of that name. It will be recalled as the play in which Blanche Bates gained her first laurels as a Belasco star, and one of the most successful "book plays" the stage has known for many years. In addition to telling an intensely interesting story of strong heart interest, "Under Two Flags" offers unusual scope for a display of modern stage craft, and the many excellent acting roles it contains makes the play a particularly desirable one for stock company use. Miss Jewel should make a most bewitching figure of "Cigarette," and Sydney Ayres is splendidly fitted for the character of Bertie Cecil, while each of the other Ye Liberty favorites will be seen to excellent advantage. The piece can be given a wonderful setting on the big revolving stage with which the theater is equipped, especially the famous scene of the fourth act depicting the rocky pass on the desert of Algiers. It is to be seen for one week only, after which Miss Jewel will be seen as "Zira" in the play of that name.

Columbia Attractions

Miss Henrietta Crosman will continue at the Columbia in Percy MacKaye's "Anti-Matrimony" for another week, after which "The Spendthrift," the latest dramatic work of Porter Emerson Brown who wrote "A Fool There Was," will be presented for the first time in San Francisco. Its scenes are laid in New York and its characters are people active in the social life of the metropolis. Its most important figures are a man and his wife who while apparently leading a life of ease and contentment, are in reality harrassed by many misunderstandings and untoward conditions. The play is a brief against feminine extravagance and frivolity. Frederic Thompson with his usual careful attention to the selection of casts has

At Idora Park

Grand opera is being sung at Idora Park Theater across the bay at bargain prices. The Bevani company made their Pacific Coast debut at the park last Sunday and met with a most enthusiastic reception. For tomorrow (Sunday), Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday, "Martha" will be the bill and during the remainder of the week "Rigoletto" will be sung. Weber's band continues to please the lovers of open air band concerts every afternoon and evening.

Shaw on the Late King

George Bernard Shaw has not been restrained by the general mourning in England from expressing his personal opinion of the late king. Writing for one of the London weeklies he delivers himself thus: "I know nothing about the late King Edward that every cabman in London does not know. Apart from inevitable glimpses of him at the opera and at public ceremonies, I was never in his presence, nor he ever in mine, except once; and that was for a moment in the French Salon in 1906. When I was looking at the pictures in one of the rooms, I heard a curiously loud voice through the doorway; and presently the owner of the voice came in and revealed himself as the King of England. Having, as an Irishman, no particular interest in kings of England; and feeling, as an inveterate republican, some remorse in the presence of a man whom I thought it desirable, on general grounds, to behead, I looked at him with some real and some simulated curiosity (for the sake of politeness), and went my way, which lay in the oposite direction to his, as we had started through the Salon from different ends. Being one of the literary glories of his reign, I should perhaps have told him who I was, so that he might have taken a good look at me; but I could not feel quite sure that he would appreciate the chance, as he was not fond of the higher drama, and never repeated his solitary visit to the Court Theater."

HENRIETTA CROSMAN

Who is appearing in "Anti-Matrimony" at the Columbia Theater.

In the comedy "Seven Days" a young woman consents to pass herself off at a dinner party as the wife of the host so a rich aunt who puts up the cash for the young man won't discover he is divorced. Just as the young woman has been accepted as the wife the whole house is quarantined and she is compelled to keep up the deception for a week.

"The Spendthrift" has as its theme the modern high cost of living and the extravagance of young couples.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—Very little of interest has transpired in the Wall Street situation during the past week and the market has lapsed into midsummer dullness, temporarily awaiting the results of the crop outlook. Liquidation and a thorough cleaning up of the speculation here has practically run its course, having discounted most of the bad features and placed Wall Street in a very strong position, the public being out of the securities and the big banking interests the chief holders, hence we find ourselves ready for a considerable up-swing in values, probably during August, if no further serious damage occurs to crops.

Grain—Since June 13 there has been an advance of 18 7-8 cents for July wheat, 19 3-4 cents for September, 21 1-2 cents for December and 22 cents for May. In this period the government's estimates have shown a deterioration of 108 million bushels from the crop promise of June 1 and private reports indicate that much further loss has been scored since the government's estimates were made. Added to the American losses have been some that were almost as important relatively in the Canadian northwest. In fact, North American losses have been large enough to cause much interest in Europe. Fears of losses in Russia at one time last week promised to start the markets of Europe off on a speculative furore similar to that experienced here during last month. Timely showers, however, turned the tide and stayed the excitement. Nevertheless, it is liable to break out again at any time. Another element of strength in last week's market was the continuous rain in the winter wheat country, mainly the soft winter wheat states east of the Missouri River. This has checked wheat marketings that had promised to become enormous. It will be recalled that similar rains fell last year at this time. In recalling this, however, the wheat speculator should remember that the delay last year greatly excited the consuming trade, while this year the consumer is utterly indifferent.

Corn—Corn made very little headway last week, insofar as its market condition was concerned. Near months advanced a little and new crop months declined a little. There is a large speculative holding of September here concentrated in two large private concerns and a big country short interest. In addition to the concentrated holding, there is much trailing along behind the big lines by local speculators of considerable capacity and resources. There has been nothing but improvement, vast and rapid, over the corn belt in the past week, except a whispering at the close of damage by firing in Oklahoma. It is reasonably safe to assume, however, from the location of the big holdings here that there will be the usual campaign based on the annual crop scare this month or next. In fact, the ground work is now being laid in the shape of claims of moisture deficiency in some of the states of large production.

Cotton—Weather and crop reports over two-thirds of the cotton belt remain unfavorable, yet European trades appear to be unconcerned. Such was their attitude at this time last year when values for new crop deliveries were about on a level with quotations ruling today and it may be that they will hold off again until the last moment notwithstanding the fact that there is more reason why new crop cotton should be purchased now than last year. The world's visible and invisible on September 1 next will probably only be about one-half of last year's 3,052,000 bales and as a result of the great curtailment that has taken place in all parts of the world, it is probable that stocks of manufactured goods have been reduced in a like proportion, which makes the world dependent on the south to produce a very large crop of cotton. The market at the close of the week became quite active and stronger and from its action would indicate higher prices the coming week. It looks as if the outside trade was beginning to realize the strong position of the new crop months.

Copper—There is nothing new to be said of the copper market. Stocks are extremely dull and show a sagging tendency. The metal market has a draggy appearance and is now down to 11 1-2 cents with only a moderate demand. The old merger rumor as well as an understanding amongst the leading copper mines to curtail the production, is still being used to bolster up prices but as yet nothing has been done. The production continues even at a loss to some of the mines, while the consumption is poor, and even our foreign trade that was promising has dwindled away. The market is in a rut and will undoubtedly go lower unless something develops that will regulate the supply of the metal.

SHE KNEW THE WORST

"Sweetheart, you deem me good," I said,
As I took Bessie's soft, white hand;
"You think the life that I have led
Has been quite perfect, pure, and grand.

"But ere we wed, my darling Bess,
I tell you frankly that my ways
Have been quite devious: I confess
I've spent some wicked nights and days."

"Nay, say no more," quoth Bess, demure;
"I know it all—I know the worst:
Your mother told me, and I'm sure
You told her all your follies first."

What could I say? This trustful lamb
Had learned that once I teased the cat
And twice or thrice had stolen jam—
How could I deal with faith like that?

"True enough. I have filled out the blanks in his letter. You're virtuous job-chaser either lacks the courage to carry his argument to a conclusion or else he is too damned stupid to perceive the inevitable conclusion to which it leads. But I haven't finished. Let us examine the postulate of his repudiation of the State Central Committee. Do you know anything about the history of the resolution which was tabled by the State Central Committee, and which Johnson makes the basis of his repudiation?"

I confessed that I did not.

"I thought not," said Cynicus. "I do. Being on the staff of the Daily Pharisee I can give you some of the inside dope from the headquarters of our sacrosanct reformers That resolution was framed by that exquisite smart-aleck the Hon. Chester Rowell, of Fresno, whose mental operations might excite the enthusiasm of a pathologist. The obvious purpose of his resolution was to trick the State Central Committee. It is one of those swivel-jointed, back-action affairs designed to produce the desired effect whichever way it is handled. If the resolution had been adopted its author and the sympathetic perverts that rejoice in his abnormal cleverness would have found just as much occasion for shouting themselves hoarse as they did when it was tabled. Let me explain. It is whereased in this resolution that the Republican party is and long has been under the corrupting domination of the Southern Pacific and therefore it is resolved that henceforth we shall eliminate this diabolical influence, etc. Now it is clear enough that if the resolution had been adopted smart-alect Rowell and his friends would have exulted at the slap at Governor Gillett, Secretary of State Curry, Nat Ellery, Phil Stanton and the whole Republican administration. For it must be clear enough to anybody with mental faculties not entirely atrophied that to affirm that the railroad has been and is in control of the machinery of the Republican party of the State is tantamount to pronouncing Gillett and everybody identified with the State government tools of the—"

"Well isn't that so?" I interrupted.

"I don't know," said Cynicus taking refuge in pretended ignorance. "But," he added, "admiting that it is so, admitting that it would be wise for the State Central Committee to say so, admitting it was not indecent to ask the committee to say so, was there anything to be gained by the admission, and is it not obvious that the resolution was presented to serve no purpose but that of a few small tricksters?"

I declined to commit myself.

Cynicus went on: "The fact is, as I happen to know, the adoption of the resolution would have pleased the political hermaphrodites more than its rejection. For on its adoption they could have truthfully asserted that the State Central Committe had authoritatively placed the railroad collar on every man that is running against Johnson. As it is they can only say that the committee refused to repudiate the railroad, which after all is of no consequence since we are now doing politics under the direct primary. Nevertheless you doubtless feel that Johnson has properly availed himself of a clever stratagem."

"No, sir," I exclaimed indignantly. "I don't approve of that kind of politics. In my opinion Mr. Johnson is not aware of any sinister purpose on the part of his backers."

"Then he must be an egregious ass, and as such is not competent to fill the job he is after. However I prefer to regard him as a commonplace, transparent mountebank. The man that flim-flammed the depositors of the California Safe Deposit Bank and fattened his purse with the loot from Dalzell Brown's sequestered sack is not an ass. He has some cunning, but not enough to entitle him to the admiration of confidence operators of average intelligence. His devices are too shallow. Take for example his pretended indignation at the State Central Committee for not notifying him promptly of the resolution asking him whether he would endorse Republican candidates. That resolution was passed at the same meeting at which the Rowell resolution was tabled and was given equal publicity. Yet Johnson would have us believe that he knew of one and was ignorant of the other. The committee is accused of doing small politics for communicating with his rivals before communicating with him. He knows that the communication was lying in his office while he was touring the State. Bah! it makes a man sick to ponder the charlatanry of these political quacks. You reformers are clamoring for purity in politics, and it never occurs to you that purity is not to be attained by exalting men who are absolutely without scruple, men who will stoop to the most contemptible tricks to gain their ends."

Cynicus was so rapidly losing his temper that I was glad the dinner was ended.

of the chateau sending in my card. I had taken care to write, upon the back of it, a reminder of my former letters. During my short wait in the hall I observed two young women, both quite pretty, setting out for a walk.

"Good!" I said to myself. "I see the reason of this exile; my interview is starting out well."

The novelist received me in a charming little salon, with windows opening on the park, now yellowed by advancing autumn. A wood fire was burning in the grate, and lighted up the walls, hung with rose-colored cretonne, which formed the background for some colored English prints. It was very much the wordly sort of setting with which report had often reproached Fauchery. But the papers and books which loaded the table testified that the temporary occupant of this coquettish retreat continued to be a faithful devotee of letters. The laboriousness of his life was further attested by a physiognomy which, I confess, immediately occasioned me a little remorse for the deception to which I was lending myself. If I had found Fauchery the pretentious snob that the chroniclers of the Boulevard class baited every week, I should have enjoyed worming my interview out of him. But I perceived, as he laid down his pen to receive me, a man about fifty-seven years old, his face worn with study, his eyes tired and old, and his forehead heavy with thought.

"You must excuse me, mon cher confrere," he said, offering me an arm chair, "for having delayed our interview so long." I, his cher confrere. If he had but known!

"You see," he continued, showing me his sheet, "the tyranny of copy won't let a man be his own master. Then, too, one has less facility at my age than at yours. And now, let us talk of you. How do you happen to be at Nemours? And what have you done since the stories and verses you were so kind as to send me?"

It is useless to try to strangle, once for all, one's young ideal. When one has loved literature as I loved it at twenty, he cannot console himself at twenty-six, for having sacrificed, even to implacable necessity, his true love. So Pierre Fauchery remembered my poor verses! He had even read my little story! The allusion which he proceeded to make to it proved this still further. Could I tell him, at that moment, that since the composition of these early works I had despaired of success, and had changed my attitude toward literature and life?

A picture of the desks of Le Boulevard suddenly rose to my mind. I heard the voice of my editor-in-chief: "Interview Fauchery? Nonsense! You will never do it!" The recollection nerved me to continue faithful to the role I had imposed upon myself.

"I have come down to Nemours to work on a serious novel, to be called 'The Age of Love,'" I replied to the novelist's question, "and it is partially in regard to it that I wish to consult you."

"There is no age of love," he said to me, in substance, "because the man capable of love in the complex modern sense of ideal enthusiasm never ceases to love. I will go further: he never ceases to love the same thing. You know the experiment which a contemporary psychologist tried upon a series of portraits, to determine the composition of those indefinable resemblances which we call family traits? He took twenty photographs of persons of the same family, and photographed these portraits upon one plate, one on top of the other. Thus he was able to discover those common features which determine type. Well, I am persuaded that if one would try an analogous experiment, and photograph one over another the portraits of the different women that a man has loved or fancied he loved, one would discover a sort of "family resemblance" in all these women. The most inconstant men have only loved one image in the five, six or twenty faces that have charmed them. The whole question, therefore, is to learn at what age they meet the woman who approaches most nearly to their ideal. That would be, for them, the age of love.

"And the age at which one is most loved?" he continued. "Well, the most profound passion which I have ever seen a man inspire—one of my old masters, a poet, was the object of it, and he was then sixty years old. It is true that he carried himself as straight as a young man, that his step was as light as yours, that he could talk like Rivarol, and could write verses equal to Vigny's; but he had lost, successively, his wife and his children; he was very poor, very lonely, and very unhappy.

"This great artist inspired in a rich, noble and beautiful Russian girl so passionate a devotion that, because of him, she never married, and found a way, in spite of her family, to nurse him day and night in his last illness. At the present time, having bought back from the heirs everything which belonged to the poet, she keeps the room where he died furnished and arranged exactly as it was in his last days. And that was fifteen years ago! The explanation is that she found in that man, who was three times her age, the one that was identical with a certain image she carried in her heart. And then think of Goethe, and Ulrich von Lewetzow, and Lamartine, and so many others!"

The great man ended by saying:

"Since you are to be in Nemours, I shall hope to see you frequently; and today I cannot let you go without introducing you to my hosts."

This is how a humble reporter of Le Boulevard came to find himself, at the stroke of five in the afternoon, seated at a tea-table where certainly no journalist had ever been seated before, and presented as a young poet and novelist to old Marquise de Proby, with whom Fauchery was staying. The amiable, white-haired old dowager asked me questions about my pretended works, to which I answered with labored fibs, while my face reddened with what the good lady probably took for the most naive timidity. And, as if there were a malign genius which multiplies our provocations to evil actions at certain moments, the two young ladies, whose exit I had noticed, returned from their walk. I had an illuminating commentary on my recent discourse with the old novelist, when he began chatting with one of the new arrivals. She was a girl, perhaps twenty years old, a Mlle. de Russaie, if I caught her name correctly. She was tall, with an oval face, lighted up by eyes of a singular fixity and ardor. She bore a striking resemblance to a portrait in the Salon Carre of the Louvre, attributed to Francia, which is known as the "Black Cavalier," doubtless because of the somber color of his clothing and cape. About her mouth and nostrils quivered the same controlled nervousness, the same repressed fire, which gives to the portrait its striking character. They had not been together a quarter of an hour before I divined, from her way of looking at Fauchery and listening to him, the passionate interest that the old novelist inspired in her. When he spoke, she seemed oblivious of everything else, and when she spoke to him, I could feel her voice tremble, if one may express in that way its peculiar timbre; and he, the great writer satiated with triumphs, exhausted with labors, seemed, under the influence of her naive idolatry, to have recovered that vivacious elasticity, which is the grace of enamoured youth.

"I understand now why he cited Goethe and the girl at Marienbad a little while ago," I said to myself, smiling inwardly, while the hired carriage was taking me back to Nemours. "He was thinking of himself. He is in love with that girl, and she with him. He'll probably marry her—and that will be a marriage to inspire copy! I can see myself rising in Pascal's estimation when he learns that I was present during the preliminaries! But for the present, I must consider my interview. Fauchery will be rather astonished to read it in day after tomorrow's paper. And yet, after all, I'm not treating him very decently. But what harm am I doing him? And besides—the struggle for existence!

By such arguments as these I strove to lull to sleep the voice that was crying within me:

"You have no right to put upon paper and serve up to the public the confidences of that noble writer who thought he was receiving a novelist and poet!"

But I heard also the skeptical voice of my editor: "You won't get it!"

And this second voice, I am ashamed to confess, got the better of the other, the more so as I was confronted by an evening with nothing to do. I had returned to Nemours too late for the train which would have landed me in Paris at the dinner hour. They had given me a very clean and quiet chamber in the old inn. "This is just the place to write my article," I said to myself, and I employed my time until going to bed in preparing the interview which was to begin the series. I scribbled away, inspired by the vivid impressions of the afternoon, my talent quickened, perhaps, like my nerves, by a suspicion of remorse. I wrote four pages that would not have disgraced the Goncourt journal, that exquisite manual of the perfect reporter. Everything was in it: my journey and my arrival at the chateau—a silhouette of that coquettish structure with its spreading trees and its dainty walks—the master's salon, and the master himself; his remarks, the pleasant tea-party to end up with, and the smile of the old novelist amid his circle of friends. Only one sentence was lacking for the conclusion.

"I shall have it when I awake in the morning," I said to myself, and, such is the literary temperament, I fell asleep with a consciousness of accomplished duty. I had written, under the head of an interview, my best page of fiction, and I rejoiced in the knowledge of it.

Perhaps, while we sleep, a secret ferment of ideas goes on within us, which is the more potent since our senses are sealed against influences from the outer world. However that may be, I found myself, on awakening, in a humor quite different from that in which I had gone to sleep. My eyes had not been open five minutes before the image of Pierre Fauchery arose before me. Immediately, the feeling that I had abused his gracious welcome became almost insupportable. I felt a passionate desire to see him again, to beg his pardon for my deception. I wished to tell him who I was, with what object I had gained entrance into his home, and how deeply I repented of it. But there was no need of such a confession; all that was necessary was to destroy the interview I had written the night before. Before tearing it up, I read it over. And then—every man of letters will understand me—and then, it seemed to me so admirable that I could not destroy it.

"Fauchery is so intelligent, so generous," I reasoned with myself, "that he will not be angry. After all, what is there in this interview that could really offend him? Nothing, absolutely nothing! Suppose I should go to him this morning and tell him that on the success of this series of articles depends my whole future as a journalist? When he knows that I have spent five years in poverty and toil, and that I have gone into journalism in order to get enough to eat, he will forgive me, he will pity me, and he will say: 'Publish your interview.' But suppose he should forbid me to publish it?"

I passed most of the morning debating the question. A natural pride made it very painful for me to consider confessing my duplicity. But the plan had in its favor the fact that it would conciliate my scruples, and, at the same time, would serve the interests of my purse. I had known the lordly Pascal to be very generous when an interview pleased him. And had he not, besides, promised me a bonus if I made myself Fauchery's confessor? I had decided to hazard the experiment when, as I was about to enter the vehicle which had conveyed me the day before, I saw passing, a victoria in which I recognized with stupefaction, leaning back in the cushion and abandoned to a gloomy reverie, Pierre Fauchery himself. A small trunk upon the seat beside the coachman indicated with sufficient clearness that he was on his way to the station. I looked at my watch. The train for Paris would leave in twelve minutes. There was just time to tumble my effects into my valise and pay my bill without verifying it, and the vehicle which was to have taken me back to the chateau de Proby was conveying me toward the station hot haste. As the train began to move, I found myself seated in a compartment, alone with the celebrated writer, who was saying to me: "I have thought a good deal about our conversation and your novel, and I fear I expressed myself badly yesterday. When I said that one may love and be loved at any age, I should have added that love sometimes arrives too late; that is, when one no longer has the right to prove to the one he loves how much he loves her, except by sacrifice. I should like, while asking you not to make use of it, for the secret is not my own, to give you a 'human document' as they say nowadays, which is a whole little drama and catastrophe in itself."

On my promise of discretion, he continued: "I had a friend, my companion in years, who at twenty was much in love with a young girl. Their parents separated them. The girl was married to another man, and died almost immediately. My friend lived on. You will know some day that it is equally true to say that we outlive everything, and that we never outlive anything. I had been the confidant of my friend's passion. I was afterwards the confidant of the adventures that succeeded his first great disappointment. He felt and inspired other affections; he tasted other joys, he suffered other sorrows. And yet, when we were alone and fell into that vein of confidence which comes from what I call the depths of the heart, it was always the ideal fiancee of his twentieth year who reappeared in his rhapsodies. Often he has said to me, 'I have sought only her among them all, and, as none of them was ever quite the same, I have never truly loved anyone else.'"

"And she?" I asked, "did she love him?"

"He did not think so," replied Fauchery. "At any rate, she never told him so. Now imagine this friend at my age, or near it. Picture him already growing wrinkled and gray and wearied of life, quite persuaded, at last, that he has won peace. And then during a sojourn among relatives in the country he meets a girl, who is a counterpart, to the point of hallucination, of her whom he had wished to marry thirty years before. It was one of those resemblances which extend from the color of the eyes to the quality of the voice, from the smile to the turn of the thought, from a gesture of the hand to the finest sensibilities of the heart. It is not in two brief phrases, it is only in pages and pages that I could express the strange emotions by which my friend was affected. He displayed that mingled tenderness for one dead and one living; that hypnotism of the soul which does not know where its dreams and recollections end and where real emotion begins It was a daily mingling of what is most remote and intangible, the recollection of a lost bride, with that which is most living and fresh, most irresistibly naive and spontaneous, a young girl. She comes and goes, laughs, sings—and one sees in her a woman who has long since passed away.

"After a month of thoughtless abandon to the dangerous delights of this inward confusion, imagine my friend going by chance into one of the most unfrequented rooms of the house, an art gallery, where, among other pictures, was a pastel of himself, painted when he was twenty-five. Suppose he absently walks over to look at this portrait. A fire has been made in the room, so that a slight haze has formed upon the glass which protects the pastel; and on the glass, with the assistance of the haze, he sees distinctly the imprint of two lips, which have been pressed to the portrait over the eyes—two fine, delicate lips, and the sight of the marks sets his heart on fire. He leaves the gallery and questions the servant. No one has been in there that morning except the girl who haunts his mind.

"And then?" I asked, as he paused.

"Then my friend returned to the gallery to look once more at that token of innocent and passionate caresses. There was a mirror near, in which he could compare his face of today with that of former days. What took place within him at that moment he has never told me, and I have never asked. Did he feel guilty at having inspired a passion in a girl—that it would have been mad, almost criminal, for him to marry? Did he suddenly understand that beneath his age, now so evident, it was his youth that the child loved? Did he think, with poignant sorrw, of that other girl who had never given him kisses when he would have been permitted to return them? I only know that he went away that same day, resolved never again to see her whom he could not love with the hope, the candor, the soul of his twentieth year—as he had loved the other."

Some hours afterward, I was again among the desks of Le Boulevard, facing the lordly Pascal

"Well?" he inquired curtly. "Did you interview Fauchery?"

"He would not even see me," I replied, as if much hurt.

"What did I tell you?" chuckled the chief, shrugging his broad shoulders. "We shall roast his next book."

While the individual honors of the Glidden Tour are in contention among the various tire factories, one conclusion is sure, that the famous endurance test has proven the efficiency generally of modern methods of tire making over those of a few years back. In a letter to the local branch, Theo. Weigele of the Diamond Rubber Company's tire department sets forth the Diamond's claim to victory on mileage cost. On fourteen cars equipped with the Diamonds only four blowouts were recorded. Aside from unavoidable punctures and cuts there were no other occasions for changing Diamond tires. Because of the impossibility of keeping full records during the last stage of the run exact computation of mileage cost is impossible. On the whole, however the tire records this year, in view of the almost impossible road conditions, are surprisingly good. All tires underwent the severest kind of punishment and the drivers to a man agree that it is marvelous that the saving air cushions at all withstood the service.

On the Atlanta to New York tour John J. Woodside of Atlanta wires from Philadelphia as follows: "Hurrah for the Thomas Flyer. Model "K" has brought us here in good shape. Has given us no trouble. Heavy rain for several days has made some of the roads almost impassible. The clay roads over the mountains of Virginia caused us to be penalized, the roads being very narrow and skiddy with many slow cars ahead of us which could not give us the right of way without danger to themselves. For this delay the Thomas was not responsible. It will always be my pleasure to speak a good word for the best car on the market which I know the Thomas to be."

The other day up at the Pioneer Company some one said that he didn't believe the Glidden tour was much of a test, but just a sort of pleasure stunt where a bunch of cars go out and run around the country and are met at the different towns by bands and reporters so that they could get plenty of publicity. "I am very glad you brought that up," said C. C. Eib, "for I believe that the Glidden in California, at least, is not given proper credit. It is a test pure and simple compared with which any tour ever held in the west would look like the trial run of a boy's tricycle on a city pavement. Why if the Glidden were ever brought to California the hardest thing we would have to contend with would be selecting a course sufficiently bad to insure road penalties and lots of them. A comparative course would take the contestants over going that most drivers would balk at."

J. W. Shannon who has just completed a 2,500 mile tour in his Hynes, a large part of which took him over the hard roads of the oil fields, made the entire trip on Diamond tires without a single puncture. A feature that put the tires to the supreme test was the intense hotness of the soil caused by the torrid weather that is now prevalent in the interior sections of the State. Previous to the trip the tires had already given about 1500 miles of services.

Rowe Sanderson, secretary of the California Truck Co. of Los Angeles, accompanied by his wife, arrived in San Francisco recently, having toured up from the southern metropolis in a Hupmobile. Mr. Sanderson came up by the valley roads and after a short visit intends driving back by the coast route. The Hupmobile came up with a perfect score and proved itself the ideal economy car for two-passenger touring purposes.

S. G. Chapman has been advised by a telegram from Oskaloosa, Iowa, that the big sensation at the Albia Automobile race meet was the performance of the Oakland car when it far outdistanced the field in the second event for $1000 cars and set a new record for the track. Not only did the Oakland which was recently received in an allotment of regular stock cars by the local dealer, prove itself far superior to anything in its class but its performance ranked well among the best made by the highest priced cars.

W. H. Thompson, secretary of the Standard Motor Car Co., drove a Ford to the Thompson Ranch in San Mateo County recently. The ranch is located in the heart of the Coast Range Mountains and can be reached only by long steep climbs. Leaving San Mateo it is necessary to make practically twelve miles of continuous upgrade, some of the stretches of which are 23 per cent. The roadbed all the way is soft dirt but in spite of the difficult going the Ford reached the summit without the water in the tank becoming warm. This achievement is all the more remarkable in view of the fact that the weather was extremely hot.

The Pioneer Automobile Company are just in receipt of the following letter from Mr. E. R. Dow of the Fresno branch of the Cudahy Packing Company: "It might be of interest to you to know that I received my first puncture, after driving my Chalmers "30" four thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine miles. Included in this driving are three hard mountain trips, where the roads were very rough and rocky. The car is runing as good as new as I will show you when I drive it to San Francisco in the near future."

H. E. Doty, assistant manager of the White Co. accompanied by a party of six, drove to Santa Cruz recently in a five-passenger White Gasoline Car. The clock struck the quarter hour after 5 o'clock when Doty left his house in the morning and when he asked the time, after having backed the machine into the garage at Santa Cruz he was told that it was 9 o'clock. Doty states that although they kept going steadily all the while no reckless driving was indulged in to make this remarkable time.

The two Pacific submarines, the Pike and Grampus which are maneuvering off the San Diego coast, are astonishing naval authorities by the success of their tests. By making six hundred miles on a continous run recently these two boats brought the world's record and a tremendous amount of prestige to the United States Navy. A letter received by Geo. P. Moore, Pacific Coast representative of the New York Lubricating Co., speaks in terms of highest praise for Monogram Oil and the important part it played in assisting the submarines to their wonderful record.

SUMMONS TO ESTABLISH TITLE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—Department No. 1, No. 22,257.

ELISABETH MILLS REID and OGDEN MILLS, Plaintiffs, vs.
All Persons Claiming any Interest in, or Lien Upon, the Real Property Herein Described or any Part Thereof, Defendants.

The People of the State of California: To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Elisabeth Mills Reid and Ogden Mills, plaintiffs, filed with the clerk of the above entitled Court and City and County, within three (3) months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

First Parcel—All that certain lot, piece or parcel of land bounded and described as follows: Commencing at the corner formed by the intersection of the northerly line of Bush Street with the easterly line of Montgomery Street; running thence easterly along said northerly line of Bush Street one hundred and thirty-seven (137) feet and six (6) inches; running thence northerly and at right angles to said northerly line of Bush Street one hundred and thirty-seven (137) feet and six (6) inches; running thence westerly and at right angles to the last mentioned course sixty-seven (67) feet and six (6) inches; running thence northerly and at right angles to the last mentioned course twenty-two (22) feet; running thence westerly and at right angles to the last mentioned course seventy (70) feet to the easterly line of Montgomery Street; and running thence southerly along said easterly line of Montgomery Street one hundred and fifty-nine (159) feet and six (6) inches to the point of commencement.

Second Parcel—All that certain lot, piece or parcel of land bounded and described as follows: Commencing at a point on the northerly line of Bush Street, distant thereon one hundred and thirty-seven (137) feet and six (6) inches easterly from the corner formed by the intersection of the northerly line of Bush Street with the easterly line of Montgomery Street; running thence easterly and along the said northerly line of Bush Street sixty-eight (68) feet and nine (9) inches; running thence at right angles northerly one hundred and thirty-seven (137) feet and six (6) inches; running thence at right angles westerly sixty-eight (68) feet and nine (9) inches; and running thence at right angles southerly one hundred and thirty-seven (137) feet and six (6) inches to the point of commencement; being a part of Fifty Vara Lot Number Two Hundred and Three (203).

Third Parcel—An undivided one-half of that certain lot, piece or parcel of land bounded and described as follows: Commencing at a point on the easterly line of Laura Place, distant thereon one hundred and twelve (112) feet and six (6) inches southerly from the southerly line of Pine Street, and which point is also eighty-seven (87) feet and six (6) inches easterly from the easterly line of Montgomery Street; running thence southerly and along said easterly line of Laura Place and parallel with the easterly line of Montgomery Street twenty-five (25) feet; running thence at a right angle easterly seventy-seven (77) feet and six (6) inches; running thence at a right angle northerly and parallel with the easterly line of Montgomery Street twenty-five (25) feet; and running thence at a right angle westerly seventy-seven (77) feet and six (6) inches to the easterly line of Laura Place and point of commencement; being part of Fifty Vara Lots Numbers Two Hundred and Two (202) and Two Hundred and Fifty-five (255); subject, however, to all the terms, conditions, covenants and agreements contained in that certain indenture made on the 11th day of December, 1906, by and between Exchange Realty Company, a corporation duly incorporated under the laws of the State of California, having its principal place of business in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and D. O. Mills and Ogden Mills and Elisabeth Mills Reid (wife of Whitelaw Reid), and recorded in the office of the County Recorder of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on the 5th day of February, 1907, in Liber 64 of Deeds, at page 10, New Series.

Fourth Parcel—An undivided one-fourth of that certain lot, piece or parcel of land bounded and described as follows: Commencing at a point one hundred and twelve (112) feet and six (6) inches southerly on a perpendicular line drawn from a point on the southerly line of Pine Street one hundred and sixty-five (165) feet easterly from the easterly line of Montgomery Street, which point of commencement is also seventy-seven (77) feet and six (6) inches easterly on a perpendicular line drawn from a point on the easterly line of Laura Place one hundred and twelve (112) feet and six (6) inches southerly from the southerly line of Pine Street; running thence southerly and parallel with Laura Place twenty-five (25) feet; running thence at a right angle easterly and parallel with Pine Street twenty-five (25) feet; running thence at a right angle northerly and parallel with Laura Place twenty-five (25) feet; and running thence at a right angle westerly twenty-five (25) feet to the point of commencement; being part of Fifty Vara Lot Number Two Hundred and Two (202); subject, however, to all the terms, conditions, covenants and agreements contained in that certain indenture made on the 11th day of December, 1906, by and between Exchange Realty Company, a corporation duly incorporated under the laws of the State of California, having its principal place of business in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and D. O. Mills and Ogden Mills and Elisabeth Mills Reid (wife of Whitelaw Reid), and recorded in the office of the County Recorder of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on the 5th day of February, 1907, in Liber 56 of Deeds, at page 371, New Series.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiffs will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that the plaintiffs are the owners of said property in fee simple absolute; that their title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consist of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiffs recover their costs herein and have such other relief as may be meet in the premises.

Witness my hand and the seal of said Court this 16th day of July, A. D. 1910.

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of MARY C. DEASY, sometimes known as MAY DEASY, plaintiff, filed with the clerk of the above entitled Court and City and County, within three months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City andCountyof San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

PARCEL No. 1.—Commencing at a point on the Westerly line of Twentieth Avenue, distant thereon One Hundred and Thirty-one (131) feet Northerly from the Northwesterly corner of Twentieth Avenue and California Street; thence running Northerly along said Westerly line of Twentieth Avenue Twenty-five (25) feet; thence at right angles Westerly One Hundred and Twenty (120) feet; thence at right angles Southerly Twenty-five (25) feet; and thence at right angles Easterly One Hundred and Twenty (120) feet to the point of commencement. Being a part of Block Number Ninety-one (91), Outside Lands.

PARCEL NO. 2.—Commencing at a point on the Westerly line of Noe Street, distant thereon Twenty-six (26) feet and Six (6) inches Southerly from the Southerly line of Hill Street; running thence Southerly and along the Westerly line of Noe Street Twenty-five (25) feet; thence at a right angle Westerly Eighty (80) feet; thence at a right angle Northerly Twenty-five (25) feet; thence at a right angle Easterly Eighty (80) feet to the Westerly line of Noe Street and the point of commencement. Being a part of Mission Block Number One Hundred and Ten (110).

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that the plaintiff is the owner of said property in fee simple absolute; that her title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consist of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiff recover her costs herein and have such other relief as may be meet in the premises.

Witness my hand and the seal of said Court this 10th day of June, A. D. 1910.

SUMMONS (Divorce)

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 28,873, Dept. No. 10.

ELSIE FREDERICA McGLYNN, sometimes called FREDERICA McGLYNN, Plaintiff, vs.

CHARLES S. McGLYNN, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

The People of the State of California, send Greeting to Charles S. McGlynn, Defendant:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, on the ground of defendant's wilful neglect; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the Complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

Given under my hand and the Seal of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 2nd day of April, A. D. 1910. H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.
(Seal) By L. J. WELCH, Deputy Clerk.

A Good Political Novel

"The Man Higher Up" is another of the good political novels, its author Henry Russell Miller. Who or what its hero, Bob McAdoo was he never himself knew. At six years of age he ran away from the one tenement room of which he was the third inmate, resolving that his equal guardian, Jim Thompson, a "gentleman in misfortune," should not beat him again, and, being in possession of a dime he invested it in evening papers and established himself on an eligible corner as a newsie, to the disgust of its previous occupant who promptly challenged him to a fight. Bob, nothing loath, as promptly demolished the contestant, and having won the admiration of the police officer on the beat he was thenceforth secure of protection. When nightfall came Patrick Flinn escorted the waif to his own domicile and enlisted the sympathy of his good wife, with the result that although there was already a goodly supply of young Flinns, Bob was added to their number. He was an independent little scamp from the first and insisted on paying his board as the only condition on which he would remain with them. Sent to school, he speedily became a "holy terror," learning little not from lack of natural ability but from his propensities for mischief and when at thirteen he decided to go no more, there were no regrets at this defection. He early came to the conclusion that though there is room at the top, only those who are unhampered have much of a chance in the upward struggle, so, even as a boy, he deliberately held himself aloof from entanglements. He made no friends, and created no obligations. He was not without a sense of honor—he never broke his word but he was cautious about making promises. He was a born leader and long before he reached his majority he had a following and became at once a power in his ward—a heeler. His advancement to the place of ward leader came in characteristic fashion. His old benefactor, Flinn's son-in-law, was threatened with the loss of his political office and of course, his immediate livelihood. McAdoo organized his following in opposition to Haggin, who made blustering threats but when it came to the point that ex-pugilist was literally knocked out and became the lieutenant and life-long friend of his vanquisher. Up to this time McAdoo had been working in one of the steel mills but the contemptuous view of the niece of the millionaire owner, who looked upon working men as an inferior brand of cattle, determined him to get himself out if not up. Accordingly he left the mill and devoted himself entirely to politics, making money by the ordinary grafting methods, keeping his following in line and never missing a step he had once taken. We go well in behind the scenes and have a chance to see the working of the mechanism, the wire-pulling, trading, compromising and dictating and always the spoils to the same victor. McAdoo was neither better nor worse than others, but more efficient. He had a personal magnetism which drew men to him and probably because he was so hard and cold, rather than in spite of it, they admired and followed him. So, starting as a ward heeler as corrupt as any of the species, we find him climbing the successive steps until before his fortieth year he had run the entire gamut, ending by being elected governor on the reform ticket. And reformed he was, not so much through conviction that graft and dishonesty were sinful as through expediency. McAdoo saw further ahead than his contemporaries and he was able to forecast the certainty that the people would not always remain blind so it was well for him to come over in good time and lead instead of being left behind. Only once in his career did he admit any one to a personal intimacy, that is any one outside of the Flinn household, for the Flinns shared all his prosperity and took the place of family to him. During one of the hard-fought campaigns there appeared on the scene a magnetic youth, manifestly from a circle far above that from which McAdoo had sprung. Remington was handsome, egoistic, a born orator and a consummate actor. He had posed so much and so often that he hardly knew himself when, if ever, he was in earnest. First setting himself in opposition to McAdoo, in a little while he came over and despite the coldness of one nature and the insincerity of the other, they became genuine and close friends while it lasted. Remington's vanity was the wedge on which the friendship was split. He had ambition beyond his capacity, and, having fallen in love with a wealthy woman, the sister of one of the financial powers whom McAdoo was fighting (this was in the days of the reformation), a comfortable financial settlement, a withdrawal of opposition to the marriage and some judicious falsehoods proved too much for him to withstand. Neither did McAdoo escape falling in love, and of course, with the same woman who had indirectly wrecked Remington. To the victor belong the spoils so of course McAdoo was the successful suitor, but frankly, whether as Eleanor Sanger or Mrs. Gilbert, she does not seem to have been worth while. Kathleen Flinn would have been twice as suitable a mate for McAdoo and she was far and away the better woman of the two. "The Man Higher Up" is a book well worth the reading and the writing, but does not clarify the political situation any. We may make a fair guess at the identity of Steel City and the State in which it is located, but conditions are much the same in every sizable community, and as long as financial gain is the only sort of success that we make account of the Bob McAdoos, who have in them the qualities which would make for better things will fight for money, if for no other reason than that without it they are barred from everything else. It is a signiñcant fact that most of our political bosses have risen from the lowest level and that they simply use the tools they find at hand, the corrupt and corruptible officials, the venal voters and the financial powers who divide with them. This is another of the handsomely gotten up volumes from the Bobbs Merrill Co.

Why He Hesitated

The conductor was inclined to seek for sympathy.

"Do you see that woman on the left-hand side of the car, up near the front?" he asked the thin man at the rear.

"Yes, I see her."

"The one with the dizzy hat?"

"Yes."

"Well, I think she's tryin' to cheat me out of a fare. When I went in to collect she never looked around, an' I ain't quite sure that she didn't pay me before—although I'm almost positive about it. She looks to me like a woman who'd be glad to stir up a fuss. I can pick 'em out as far as I can see 'em. You never spot a woman with a face like that who isn't ready to bluff her way anywhere. I wish to goodness I knew whether she'd paid her fare or not."

"I wouldn't worry about it any more," said the thin man. "I paid the lady's fare some time ago—she's my wife."

TIRES

ARE THE BEST

Drivers Tell Why They Won Tour

On mileage cost—wear resistance—absence of defect—freedom from blowouts and notable superior capacity to resist shocks, the most nearly complete record shows:

14 Cars used strictly stock Diamond Tires.
24 Cars divided among six other makes.
4 blowouts on Diamond Tires.
12 blowouts on largest competing makes.
8 blowouts on other competing makes.
13 Diamond Tires replaced account of cuts.
15 largest competing make of tire replaced account of cuts.
55 Diamond Tires punctured.
63 largest competing make punctured.
2 Cars changed to Diamond Tires en route.

WITH TRUTH AND ACCURACY, no one can give complete statement of tires, results and mileage cost during latter part of tour, as it is well known only a few cars even approximated schedule at all times. Cars were often one to three days behind and tire observers were utterly unable to gather complete data. ANY FIGURES presented as complete, are, therefore, juggled and misleading.

Regarding Results---Drivers Say:

"Diamond record this tour is grand evidence of their excellence."—Ralph Robitaille (Chalmers Pilot Car.)

"Carried seven passengers from start to finish of tour. Original tires still on and in dandy condition.—Rudolph Faaha (Halliday Press Car.)

"Greatly appreciate tire service in tour. Only trouble had was punctures."—Charles Ballinger (Premier No. 2.)

"On heaviest loaded car in tour Diamond Tires gave good service. Original air in one tire."—J. J. Caffrey (Columbia Pacemaker.)

"No others could have given me the service obtained, with Diamonds. Only changes due to punctures."—Fred Castle (Glide Car No. 10.)

"Including sixty-four hour continuous drive, in which I did not touch tires. Diamonds gave fine service throughout tour."—O. F. Van Sicklen (Falcar No. 6.)

"Congratulate the Diamond Rubber Co. on splendid results the tires gave me."—C. C. Bavington (Westcott No. 111.)

"Finished tour with original air in two Diamond Tires. Only changes were due to severe cuts."—W. Donnely (Cino No. 15.)

"Only tire chances I made were due to cuts."—J. R. Ande (Chalmers Confetti Car.)

"Did not believe any tire made could withstand such usage as necessarily put upon my Diamond equipment."—George Neff (Parry No. 105.)

"Very satisfactory results throughout on Diamond Tires in tour."—A. L. Martin (Cole No. 104.)

"Your selection of Diamond Tires as the best was more than justified by Glidden tour results."—John Glover (Westcott Press Car.)

"Very excellent service given me by Diamond Tires throughout the tour. Punctures caused the only changes."—L. M. Dull (Parry No. 9.)

"Most remarkable service on worst roads ever traveled by an auto was the Diamond Tire record on the tour."—Parry Knight (Cole No. 6.)

Sewage Municipally Served to Children

Some of those good people who are convinced that municipal ownership is akin to the beatitudes probably have been pondering ruefully the startling information which the daily papers have given them about the water in Golden Gate Park. Here we have a concrete example of municipal ownership of a public utility and the tendencies thereof. The water used in the park by man and beast comes from wells owned by the city. Some months ago sewage seeped into these wells, and ever since the water has been alive with deadly germs. The contamination of the water was perhaps unavoidable, but it was certainly within the power of the authorities to prevent the use of it. They cannot plead ignorance of the fact that the water was unfit to drink as they received information to that effect from physicians. Furthermore it has been known that fatal cases of typhoid fever were traceable to the faucets in Golden Gate Park. In the course of time the Board of Health took belated cognizance of the criminal negligence of the park authorities, but even then the disease-breeding water was not shut off. For nearly a week after the health authorities learned that the water was a menace to human life it continued to flow in the children's playground, and little tots were permitted to swallow diluted sewage until Mayor McCarthy was informed of the outrageous state of affairs and compelled the action that should have been taken months before. All of which it is not exaggeration to characterize as a fair specimen of the lackadaisical ways of public servants.

Our Curious Campaign

The current political campaign abounds in trivialities that strike one as arid at first blush, but that appeal to one cogently on reflection. Let us consider one of them —the circumstance that of all the aspirants for gubernatorial honors there is but one concerning whom it is not assumed that he is dependent for campaign expenses on one or on a small clique of friends and that of this candidate it is charged, as though it were greatly to his discredit, that he is representative of "the interests." To apprehend the enormity of this circumstance one must reflect that the campaign is being conducted under a law designed by the friends of the people to enable the people to come into their own through the medium of somebody of their choice. The supposition is that this law will insure the election of a man of the broadest sympathies, one representing the greatest number of the vital interests of the commonwealth. Yet what do we find? We find some of the most vociferous friends of the people inveighing bitterly against Mr. Alden Anderson on account of the interests by which he is supported. They warn us against him because the men that make wine and the men that make beer are in favor of his election. Yet these men are not outcasts. They are not even classified as undesirable citizens. The only stigma on them is the dollar mark, which, in the present state of the public mind is not to be regarded as ineffaceable. In the managing and marshalling of their interests they contribute to the wealth of the State and to the prosperity of comparatively harmless individuals who raise grapes, grow hops and make barrels. All these men are authorized by law to take an interest in the affairs of government. Likewise the bankers of the State, the lumber men, the orchardists and even the unspeakable railroad men, all of whom constitute the so-called "interests" that have boldly espoused the cause of Mr. Anderson. It hardly seems heterodox to assume that having enlisted the support of so many interests Mr. Anderson is the kind of man whom the authors of the direct primary law had in mind when they were urging its adoption. Not so. Their ideal candidate is a man in sympathy exclusively with their aims and pretensions; one whose faith in his own rectitude is such that he has no hesitation in permitting his campaign to be financed by a few and swearing that he will be just to all. Thus we have among the trivialities of this campaign the spectacle of a band of reformers proclaiming as the ice of Zembla the purity of their paid puppet, and holding up to execration on account of his affiliations the man who is undeniably endorsed by the men that control the leading industries of the State. And singularly enough what the outcome of this curious campaign will be no man can predict; for under the influence of hallucinations all common modes of reasoning are perverted and all general principles abandoned.

A Taft Policy

The Roosevelt policies are still in the public eye to the exclusion of all else in the affairs of the Government at Washington. The attitude of President Taft toward these policies is considered the only matter of importance. To what extent he is following the sanctified precedents of his predecessor is regarded as the only question worth while. Yet Mr. Taft being a man of a creative turn of mind with a few ideas of his own is not without a few original policies of some importance. One of these policies is perhaps as important as any that he inherited, and the probability is that in carrying it out he will transform our system of government; not the system designed by the Founders but the system into which we have insensibly drifted. Ours has become a bureaucratic form of government. The destinies of the nation have come in a great measure to be shaped by the bureaucrats at Washington, the men whose political fortunes are not affected by changes of administration, who have become experts in their respective departments, and who are in touch with all branches of the Federal service throughout the country. These men form a powerful clique of politicians. The public never hears of them, but the effect of their manipulations is felt in every State. By reason of their long service and the friendly relations they have established with Washington correspondents and other influential persons to whom they have vouchsafed courtesies and favors they are able to command a widespread sympathy. Let the prerogatives of one of them be threatened and instantaneously the whole bureaucratic machinery of defense is set in motion. And of course these bureaucrats are not dependent for protection entirely on the powerful friendships they can evoke. Familiar as they are with the joints in the harness of great statesmen, cognizant as they are of the great and small irregularities that are incident to the workings of our big government machine their potentialities in the matter of resentment are immeasurable. It is the system which these men have built up at the source of government that is likely to be affected by one of the Taft policies.

The Law and the Greater Good

Unfortunately this anti-bureaucratic policy of President Taft's is not to be carried out without the violation of one of the Roosevelt policies. Most of these bureaucrats being civil service dignitaries occupy a rather defiant attitude toward the representatives of the people in public office. They can be compelled to do nothing but obey the law. Now according to one of Mr. Roosevelt's most sacred policies the soundness of the law must always be tested by questions of the "greater good." He found, as everybody can find, specific instances in which the law serves as a restraint on wise and virtuous public servants intent upon advancing the public weal. He argued that in such instances the wise and virtuous ought to circumvent the statute, and it was largely because of the noble manner in which he vindicated the courage of this conviction that he captivated the imagination of the people. And not only did he have faith in his own wisdom and virtue; he had faith in the wisdom and virtue of the bureaucrats, one of whom he had the pleasure of being when in the Navy Department in the days before the Spanish War. This is where President Taft differs from his predecessor. The difference is altogether a matter of temperament, the result of training. Mr. Roosevelt was trained in a bureau. Mr. Taft was trained on the bench. Therefore while Mr. Roosevelt has a high regard for bureaucratic judgment, Mr. Taft has an almost fanatical reverence for the law. The attitude of each toward Mr. Gifford Pinchot exemplifies the irreconcilable antithesis. When Mr. Pinchot, a bureau chief, felt that foresters should be educated at the expense of the government, he found that the law would not permit him to advance the greater good by sending men to college who were on Uncle Sam's payroll and paying the expense of their education out of the treasury. So he ignored the law with Mr. Roosevelt's amiable acquiescence, and no federal grand jury interfered. When, under Mr. Roosevelt's successor, Mr. Gifford Pinchot insisted that the greater good should be advanced the law to the contrary notwithstanding, a halt was called, Mr. Pinchot was ordered to attend to the business of his bureau and to attend to it in accordance with law. And it was then that the Washington bureaucratic clique threw its first spasm and opened its batteries on the Administration.

Heads are Falling

The most powerful of all the bureaus at Washington is the bureau of construction of the Navy Department. In this bureau the Taft policy has produced a great upheaval. Secretary Meyer has been carrying out a reorganization scheme along the lines that were followed by Secretary Root when he rattled the dry bones of the War Department much to the improvement of the service. It was entirely as the result of this reorganization scheme that Washington Lee Capps resigned as chief of the bureau of construction the other day, his resignation to take effect on October 1. Mr. Capps is the second important bureau chief to fall before the reorganization plan. Several weeks ago Paymaster-General Eustace B. Rogers, chief of the bureau of supplies and accounts, resigned after a controversy with Secretary Meyer. He had refused to obey the orders of the Secretary to reduce the total of the navy supply fund. Nobody had ever given such orders before to this proud and haughty chieftain, and his indignation was great. The Secretary practically dismissed him. The retirement of these men from the navy bureaus marks the elimination of the two most important figures in the opposition to the reorganization plan, the principle of which is that naval affairs should be controlled by the line instead of by staff officers. Both Rogers and Capps representing the drawing-room sailors at Washington have criticised the Secretary for carrying out his plan, and they have many sympathizers who are "viewing with alarm" the things that are being done to the darling navy bureaus. Doubtless we shall soon learn from magazine articles how greatly they are shocked at the forcing of Mr. Capps out of the department; for this distinguished gentleman has been something more than the head of the bureau of construction; he has been running the whole navy for years. No Secretary even attempted to interfere with him before. It has long been his prerogative to determine in all emergencies just what should be done for the greater good of the service and to order it done. There are more like Capps in Washington, and though they are standing in more or less awe of the Taft policy they are neither possessing their souls in patience nor holding their power of reprisal in abeyance.

A Test of Shamelessness

Speaking of gambling in this city the Examiner says in one of its profoundly wise editorials, "No man is so lost to shame that as a public official he will shield crime unless he is paid his price." This is a sentiment in which many prudent and thrifty officials will heartily concur. And doubtless every large city abounding in golden opportunities for public servants numbers among them gentlemen whose conduct is shaped by their faith in the principle that self-respect demands the levy of blackmail on all persons engaged in any of the branches of trade that are prohibited by law. But the sentiment expressed by our learned contemporary involves an academic question about which there may be honest difference of opinion. For, indeed, there are honest differences of opinion on all questions of human conduct. The Examiner's sentiment while in harmony with the notion that all human actions are to be accounted for on the principle of self-interest also approves of that principle. A public servant, the Examiner tells us, who does not take a bribe when one becomes available by reason of his inclination to indulge somebody in the practice of a vice, is untrue to his self-interest and therefore lost to shame. Not in the Examiner's philosophy is it noble for a man to deny himself to gratify others; it is abominable. There are public servants, of course, who without profit to themselves wink at violations of the law, and who would scorn to take a bribe for their complaisance. Conscience with them is the best casuist, and it experiences no compunction when they fail to profit from their neglect of duty. Yet there are moralists who will argue the possibility of such men having a sense of shame. Indeed they will go so far as to hold that such men are not devoid of self-respect, and even to deny that self-respect is a test of virtue.

The Observations of a Cynic

Made During the Course of a Conversation that was Inspired by William R. Hearst's Plan for the Extinguishment of the Passion for Pugilism

By Demetrius

I found my friend Cynicus chuckling to himself at the club the other day, and I asked him the cause of his mirth. By way of reply he passed me a copy of the Examiner which he had been reading, and told me to read Mr. Hearst's invitation to statesmen to join the National League of Lawmakers. I did so.

"See nothing funny in it?" Cynicus asked.

I considered it a very dignified and sensible production, and had no hesitation in saying so.

"Well," said Cynicus in a mock apologetic manner. "I thought you might consider it funny that Mr. Hearst should concern himself about what foreigners think of us enlightened Americans. He says here, 'It is a well known fact that foreigners look upon prize fighting as a disgrace'; also, 'They would like to see America set a good example to all the world, and lead the way to the abolishment of all vulgar, brutal and debasing sports.'"

"What's funny about that?" I asked.

"It's essentially funny," said Cynicus. "In the first place it's funny because Hearst says it. Aside from the fact that he is always funny he is one of the many leaders of thought in this country who scorn foreign opinion about Americans. Like all our demagogues he would have us believe that the sovereign people of this country is intellectually superior to all other peoples on the earth. In the second place it is funny because if we are to abolish prize fighting in deference to foreign opinion to be logical and consistent we shall have to abolish other things also, and the first thing we shall have to abolish is the kind of journalism that Mr. Hearst practices; for there is nothing which foreign opinion so emphatically reprobates as characteristic American journalism. Curiously enough the very epithets that Mr. Hearst applies to prize fighting the enlightened opinion of Europe applies to the newspapers published by Mr. Hearst and all American newspapers of the same brand. Every notable foreign critic of America has spoken of the characteristic American newspaper as brutal in its personalities, vulgar in its tone and demoralizing in its influence. If foreign enlightened opinion can be said to agree about anything the thing that it most dogmatically agrees upon is that our nation cannot long survive the shameless perversion of the freedom of the press."

Cynicus is never so vehement as when discussing the shortcomings of the newspapers. He might have rattled on for an hour had I not interrupted him. "I suppose," said I, "that your indignation has been roused by the agitation against prize fighting."

"Then you have not supposed accurately," said Cynicus somewhat tartly. "No kind of agitation that is inspired with the purpose of restraining an impulse of the people can provoke my indigation. Our demagogues and reformers cannot pass prohibitory measures enough to displease me. I am a man of few vices, and they are well in hand. What happens to the masses does not concern me except in so far as it appeals to my sense of humor."

"You confess to being a selfish mortal then."

"I am an individualist, or to be more accurate an anarchist."

"An anarchist?"

"Yes, but don't be alarmed. I'm as harmless an anarchist as Jack London. No bombs concealed about my person. The only difference between my anarchy and London's is that he would revolutionize society by curbing the minority while I would have it revolutionized by the self-curbing of the majority. We both have the same slogan: 'Give the people their head.' But London's idea is that the people will destroy the rich, while my idea is that the people will destroy themselves beginning with the reformers as they did in the French Revolution when demagogues sprang up like mushrooms. The crop was fecundated with blood. The people honored their demagogues by making plaster effigies of them, but the guillotine finished them before the plaster was dry."

"Your coldbloodedness strikes me as an affectation."

"But I'm not coldblooded. I'm merely philosophic."

"You have no love for mankind."

"Love for mankind is always an affectation. Show me your lover of mankind and I will show you a selfish egoist in quest of power. The men that would conscientiously employ power for the good of others are the only ones that deserve it but they never desire it. Such sympathies as I have are for the weak. The people are strong. They don't need my sympathy. They need nothing but my advice and that they won't take."

"Have you no inclination to promote the public good?"

"The public good is a high consideration which the public invariably waives. Then why should I desire to promote it? Consider for example this very matter of the agitation against prize-fighting. It means agitation for more prohibition, more government, more restraint on individual liberty. Now this is not for the public good. It is really for the public bad as everybody knows who knows anything about the science of government. Yet the public is continually waiving its own interest. The people are being continually deluded into the notion that the more laws there are to violate the better it is for them. This is the logic of paternalism, and there is no fallacy so well established as the fallacy of paternalism in government. We are told that Rome declined largely on account of the love of brutality that was stimulated in the arena. The fact is that the Romans ceased to have sufficient vigor to defend themselves against the barbarians after the reign of Marcus Aurelius who banished brutality from the arena and went so far as to introduce nets and mats to safeguard acrobats against accident. Marcus Aurelius originated paternalism in Rome, and he made the Romans effete and effeminate."

The historical views of my friend astonished me. I told him it was the first time I ever heard Marcus Aurelius charged with responsibility for the degeneracy of the Romans.

"Read history by your own lights," he said, "and it will astonish you to see how greatly your judgment of events and epochs will differ from the judgment of the average historian."

And then he brought me back to the subject of prohibition.

"The people," he said, "have yet to learn that prohibition prohibits only the masses. What the masses are prohibited from doing it is always within the power of the rich to do. The poor man, for example, may be prohibited from drinking, but good liquor is always within reach of the rich. Any of the pleasures of the masses that are interdicted may be had by a trip to Europe throughout which individual liberty is respected. All Americans who have the price leave this land of the free at short intervals to unshackle themselves in countries where they are prohibited from doing nothing save the one thing which they are permitted to do at home—interfere with the business of others. They—"

Do you know what Quality means in a Turkish Cigarette? If not get a box of "MILO." Then, any other cigarette, and try same, side by side. You'll note the delicate, aromatic mildness of the "MILO." Mildness (yet with the richness in flavor) is what costs in Turkish Tobacco, and its just this that makes the Perfect Cigarette. You'll find it in No Other.

"It is evident to me," said I, interrupting Cynicus, "that love of country is not a consuming passion with you."

"I see that you entirely misunderstand me," said he; "I love my country, but I dislike the people. They bore me."

"Then you dislike democracy."

"Wrong again. It is because the people are unfit for democracy that I dislike them."

It gave me a headache trying to follow Cynicus, so I abandoned the conversation.

The Other Woman

By Paul Oscar Hocker (From the German)

He had come as far as Genoa on his trip to the Riviera, where he wanted to forget the sickness of his heart in the midst of the exuberant gaities of the carnival season, with its masked balls and flower parades. However, his itinerary had been planned in disregard of the calendar. When he landed in Nice, the beautiful carnival days were a thing of the past and an Ash Wednesday mood was brooding over the town. Neither was the weather in his favor. The sea trip had been exceedingly unenjoyable, on account of the high waves tossing the vessel. The majority of the passengers were seasick, notwithstanding the vicinity of the coast, where the chocolate-colored rocks stood out like melancholy signposts against the gray skies. All this afforded plenty of ground for legitimate wrath on the part of the traveler, who had a right to expect naught but golden sunshine and azure blue skies from the Riviera.

He established himself in one of the small French hotels which lie scattered over the lower beach at Condamine. Of course, he visited the Casino on the very first evening, where he played and won, and then lost what he had just gained. The play did not serve to excite him in the least, and he was rather irritated at his own indifference. But he was struck with the magnificence of the silk garments and rustling skirts, the regal luxury of lace displayed by the modish international society. His artistic eye was pleased with the brilliant spectacle unrolled before him at the theater or on the terrace of the Cafe de Paris. Still he did not feel light-hearted and happy. Somehow, he could not make himself care for pleasure at the present time. His recent experience had been too much for him. Often and often though he told himself that the short farewell letter he had received from Her must be the end of all things between them, yet his thoughts could not leave her, and her image was invariably present to his mind. When in a softer mood, he would yield to his longing; then again his will power would triumph.

What he needed was work, effort, activity, instead of play and pleasure. He fled from the everyday small-talk of the excursionists, not caring to simulate interests he did not share. He now planned and worked on a drama, impersonating the living memories of his love, which filled his mind to the exclusion of all other things. These were days of delight for him, although or because his task exacted strenuous efforts before the individual figures would assume distinct shape. Nothing but his drama existed for him at this period. His correspondence was entirely neglected, and when one day a certain note reached him, after circuitous journeys, he did not recall the writer at the first lines, and even afterwards he tried in vain to reconstruct her portrait from memory.

The lady's letter had been penned on board an excursion steamer, while she was enjoying a thirty days' trip on the Mediterranean. She had much to say on the subject of Monte Carlo, the paradise of flowers and of Paris model hats, which was attracting her. His answer was short and terse, with thinly veiled sarcasms. Then there came a picture postal from Corfu, in which she told him that she would probably come after all to spend a couple of weeks in "lovely and wicked" Monte Carlo, as she called it. Up to this hour, he had still hoped secretly, almost stealthily, for a sign of life from the other woman. Now this postal card awakened all his old fiery resentment. Day in and day out he had pondered over the past, but at last he was forced in bitter disappointment before the question: Did she care for him at all? Did he still mean anything at all for her feelings and her life?

"Dear doctor, have the kindness to engage pleasant quarters for me in Upper Monte Carlo," next wrote the temptress from Naples, on a picture postal ornamented with Mount Vesuvius. "I understand that everything is overcrowded out there, and my relatives, who usually relieve me of similar worries, have unfortunately decided to remain on board the steamer. Or had I better return with them to Berlin direct? What do you say?"

He held the postal undecidedly in his hand. Mount Vesuvius was laboring with uncanny efforts upon the gaudy cardboard. The wealth of colors flooding the Southern landscape had a somewhat artificial effect. He smiled at the idea that this visit should appear to him in the light of an indefinable danger in regard to the other woman. "This person is no volcano," he assured himself, "and the color of her passion is borrowed from the rouge pot."

Within the hour he rode to Monte Carlo and at the hotel transacted the courier duties assigned him by the lady. He did so with a beating heart, however, and had to admit to himself that he felt rather foolish about changing his own domicile.

All work had to be discarded for the present. From the moment that she had moved into her expensive and charmingly furnished apartment, rest and concentration were no longer possible for him. The lady took sweet revenge upon him for his indifference, doing her level best to render him enamored and jealous.

"She really is deucedly pretty!" he said to himself, when they sat down vis-a-vis at the table d'hote. She was past mistress of the arts of the toilette. Whenever he set eyes on her, he had another opportunity of admiring her in a new masterpiece of the dressmarker's art. Neither did he remain her sole admiring cavalier. She met various friends during her very first promenade along the wide terraced park of the Palace Hotel, with its celebrated vista across the gulf. These were harnessed at once to her triumphal chariot, and the same table at which she presided was the merriest one of the hotel.

He likewise had to renew a few acquaintances in the course of the following days. One of these he ran across during his after-dinner promenade on the terrace, where a Gypsy band was playing. The friend had promptly fallen in love with the fair lady on the preceding evening, although from a distance only. He was frankly envious of the young writer, whom he saw so frequently in her company.

"You must introduce me, old man! Cannot it be managed tonight?"

"I am sorry, but the lady has accepted an invitation to go to the opera in Nice."

Spalding's Fight for Baseball

Being a Sidelight on the Career of a Candidate for the United States Senate which Illuminates his Character and Illustrates his Fitness for High Political Preferment

The fact that Al. G. Spalding of San Diego is a candidate for United States Senator from California has aroused interest all over the country. The name of the man is known wherever the national game is played and that includes every hamlet in the United States. Many Californians may desire enlightenment as to his fitness for the exalted office to which he aspires. His career in baseball helps to supply that enlightenment. Not because Spalding is running for the Senate on his baseball record, for he is not, but because his achievements in the reformation of the national pastime give an excellent idea of his character.

Albert Goodwill Spalding was born at Byron, Ogle County, Illinois, September 2, 1850. A few years later he went with his widowed mother to Rockford, in the same State, where he passed his boyhood years in attendance at the public schools. Here it was that he became imbued with the spirit of republicanism, in the days when that great party was making heroic history. "No boy," Mr. Spalding has said, "could breathe the atmosphere of Northern Illinois those days without aligning himself with the party of Abraham Lincoln who was then immortalizing himself as the savior of his country."

It was shortly after this that Albert Spalding had born within him a love for the game that was to exert so great an influence on his future life. A furloughed soldier who returned to Rockford bearing the scars of battle, told young Spalding of a game of ball he had learned from eastern comrades and showed the western stripling how the game was played; besides pointing out its superiority to "barn ball," "one old cat," "two old cat," and all the other ball sports of antebellum days. It did not take Al. Spalding long to grasp the rudiments of the new American game. Very soon he had become a proficient player and his prowess as a pitcher was the envy of all his fellows. The Rockford team to which he belonged covered the name of the "Forest City" with glory. His services were sought for near and far. Faraway Boston secured him and year after year the Boston team won championship honors. But Spalding was by birth and spirit a true westerner, and when an invitation came from Chicago to play as a member of that city's team, he went—and the pennant followed him.

As a ball player Spalding made an enviable record. But it was not as a player alone that he won fame. Early in his career—long before he had become a successful man of business—he came face to face with forces of evil that were making for the destruction of the national game. Gamblers were in control; players were in collusion with them; drunkenness and rowdyism were prevalent. These evils Spalding determined to eradicate. He was not a rich man in those days. A few years before he had been working as office boy in a printing office at $4 a week. But he took up the fight. He was alone at first but he found strong helpers where least expected.

The fight was long continued and every inch of ground was stubbornly contested by the selfish enemy, determined to rule or ruin. The details of this struggle are part of the history of base ball. Everybody knows that as a result of that long conflict a splendid victory was won which had a far reaching influence upon the sport. Gambling was rooted out and collusion between players and gamesters was first rendered odious, then impossible. Ball players became so imbued with the new order of things that they assaulted gamblers who dared to accost them on the street. Drunkenness also was taboo, the running of saloons in connection with ball grounds was abolished, and the attendance of the demimonde at professional games was no longer countenanced.

Under the new order of things the sport flourished until suddenly it came face to face with another crisis from an unexpected quarter. A cabal of magnates of the National League, headed by Andrew Freedman, owner of the New York Club, conceived the idea of syndicating the game and conducting it in the interest of a trust. It was proposed to rob players of their identity, to strip them of their standing, to make them mere machines. Players were to be numbered and placarded like jockeys in a horse-race. The friends of baseball throughout the country were paralyzed at the prospect. Half the clubs in the National League had been lassoed by Freedman and were lined up for the syndicate. The newspapers of the big cities sounded the alarm and papers, players and public turned to Spalding, pleading that he enter the lists as "trust buster." So once more he threw himself into the fight to preserve our national game. He was not an executive of the National League, but as one of its founders and the author of its constitution he was an honorary member. In that capacity he literally forced himself upon the Annual Convention assembled for the avowed purpose of syndicating the national game. The magnates dared not refuse him a hearing and for an hour he poured into the ranks of the conspirators volley after volley of denunciation. He told them that he "had been present and witnessed the birth of the grand old League and was there to stay the hand that would plunge the dagger to the heart of its prostrate form." The result was that he overcame all obstacles, defeated the conspirators and forced Freedman to sell his club and abandon the game forever. Thus was a syndicate trust of baseball made impossible through the efforts of one strong man.

These are but side lights on the story of a big man's life but they serve to show what kind of a man the people of California have an opportunity of placing in the United States Senate.

Hair in Criminology

Human hair is now the study of M. Bertillon who invented the science of finger prints. He is engaged in drawing up a complete, classified and graduated table of all the colors of the human hair. This he considers a long-felt want in criminal-detection. When a man is wanted by the police in any country the hue of his hair is only vaguely described and the terms used have no standard meaning. What is called fair in Sicily is considered dark in Scandinavia and vice versa. When he has gathered together a complete collection of hair from all parts of the world M. Bertillon will classify it according to a graduated scale of shades and then number each shade. When the scale has been communicated to the police of the world, the description of a criminal will mention the number of his hair and the police of all nations will know just what color is meant.

Statue of Augustus Found

Recent excavations in Rome uncovered a statue which has been identified as that of Caesar Augustus. It is of natural size and was carved from several separate pieces of marble. It was readily identified owing to its close resemblance to other statues of Augustus in the Vatican and Louvre. A Roman art critic speaks of it as "one of the most beautiful sculptures that have come from the Augustan age." He adds that "it is neither a realistic nor an idealized conception, but rather an intensely human portrait. The Emperor of fifty years stands before you in all the consciousness of his infinite dignity and power—the truthful symbol of his great age."

Modern Ideas Tabu

Some American surgeons on a visit to England to compare American and English technique have been greatly astonished to learn that the members of the profession in that country do not take the precautions against germs that are taken in America. At King's College Hospital they saw Sir William Cheyne, professor of clinical surgery, operating according to methods that for more than a quarter of a century have been deemed most hazardous by American surgeons. Yet Sir William Cheyne is a celebrated and most successful surgeon. He is a disciple of Lord Lister who revolutionized surgery thirty-five years ago, and he adheres to Lister's methods. He works with materials having active germ killing power instead of excluding germs by perfect cleanliness. The walls of his operating room are lacking in the most familiar aseptic niceties. In the presence of the American surgeons he performed six operations. Instead of using sterilized water he kept his instruments in carbolic acid or a mercury-bichloride solution. He used ordinary sea sponges which American surgeons regard as impossible of absolute surgical cleansing, and he rinsed them in a mercury solution. The fact that fewer than one in two hundred of Sir William's cases become germ infected induces his disciples to believe that certain modern ideas are less important than is generally supposed.

German Farmers in Russia

The Russian government, having formulated a policy of "Russia for the Russians" will proceed to carry it out with a thoroughness which is likely to arouse resentment in Berlin. For two hundred years German farmers have occupied southwestern Russia, cultivating model farms and giving their Russian neighbors lessons in thrift and careful husbandry. But these farmers have preserved their own language and family institutions and a great deal of national sentiment. St. Petersburg fears that they would be a national danger in case of war, so they will be ousted. The Germans and Poles of the Baltic provinces will suffer in a similar manner.

Manila's Big Amphitheater

Berkeley is not the only place which has a huge amphitheater available for open-air performances of music. France has one, and so has Manila. A correspondent of the Pacific Coast Musical Review relates how a chorus of 5,000 school children sang in the Hippodrome, which has a seating capacity of over 10,000. "The people who entertained the usual views about children's singing, forget their indifference and were amazed to hear the Filipino children, from the second, third, and fourth grades only, sing in such fine time and in a language practically new to them." They were trained by Miss Katherine Black, formerly of San Francisco.

Perspective Impressions

The currency of a malicious story is never impaired by the improbability of it.

A shrewd man profits both from the wisdom of his friends and the folly of his enemies.

Dr. David Starr Jordan is again telling the country what is good for it, and his local admirers of the press are giving publicity to his utterances. Dr. Jordan is an exceptional prophet being regarded abroad as a silly and shallow pedagogue while at home he is revered as an intellectual giant.

The Hon. Nat Ellery is deserving of encouragement. What the procession would be without the band, the circus without the children's idol, this campaign would be without Mr. Ellery.

If the Rev. Madison Peters who is going about the country lecturing in defense of the Jews were to ask the Jews about it he would doubtless learn that they would prefer to have him engaged in defending the Christians.

Colonel Roosevelt says: "I will see that the Republicans of New York select the best man for Governor, and I will endeavor to have him accepted by the party and elected by the people." How kind of the colonel!

A New York minister who was missing for two days says that he was drugged with a cigar that was given to him by a stranger. Well of course being a minister he couldn't afford to say that he had been drugged with liquor. A poor parson is not privileged to exhaust the powers of his imagination in the interest of plausibility.

The Spectator

Older and Flannery Shake Hands

There is stir and agitation among the leading beneficiaries of the present municipal dispensation, the wise guys who picked P. H. McCarthy for a winner and are now availing themselves of the advantages of his gratitude. They are on the tiptoe of expectancy. For whispers are circulating from mouth to mouth of some vast conspiracy mining subterraneously beneath their very feet. All of which is to be attributed to the circumstance that the Hon. Harry Flannery and the loveliest of his sex, Mr. Fremont Older, have bridged the chasm of hatred that but lately seethed between them. The illustrious editor and the distinguished saloon-keeper have buried the hatchet. They have discarded the stinkpot, and they are smoking the pipe of peace. Yes, incredible though it seem, a heaven sent influence has brought together the ineffable and the anointed. This influence was embodied in Mr. Edward Graney, the erstwhile "honest blacksmith" who has won great fame as a prize fight referee. Mr. Graney is one of Mr. Older's most intimate friends. So high is the referee in the editor's esteem that when Francis J. Heney procured Graney's indictment for some ethical irregularity in connection with the business of the prize fight trust the little prosecutor incurred Mr. Older's disfavor; and to regain it he had to agree to let the indictment sleep. But this is ancient history. Mine be the task of chronicling the salient events of current history. Mr. Graney, as I have said, was the agency through which the reconciliation of the ex-police commissioner and the red mouthed prophet of reform and nemesis of all wrongdoers was effected. "They're both good fellows," said Mr. Graney, speaking of the notable entente cordiale which he achieved, "and I thought it a pity that there should be any misunderstanding between them. So I had them shake hands." A modest lover of peace and cordialty is the little arbiter of the padded arena, and in no vainglorious spirit does he discuss the great performance that may entitle him to the Nobel prize.

A Fascinating Situation

Although no one is permitted to penetrate the halcyon sanctuary of this new friendship, the ground being consecrated from intrusion, the tongues of Rumor are busy, and what the tongues are saying has caused unrest among certain gentlemen who are said to be exercising a great deal of valuable political influence in these parts. Rumor says that a great storm is whistling around them. And by reason of all that is said it is hard to wean oneself from the fascination of imagining the possibilities of the situation created by the amiable Mr. Graney. For be it known Mr. Flannery did not shake hands with Mr. Older merely to complete the exoneration that was only partially consummated by a jury over in San Rafael. Nor is one justified in assuming that the ex-police commissioner banished all hatred from his heart, or that in him the spirit of vengeance was assuaged when the man who had painted him as an infamous scoundrel, the man whom he had in turn accused of being intent on assassinating his character for base political purposes, agreed to let bygones be bygones and on the score of friendship vouchsafe him immunity from further attack. Report imputes to Mr. Flannery various designs of a sinister nature. Indeed according to report both Mr. Older and Mr. Flannery granted each other absolution for the purposes of a pact by which each might facilitate the gratification of his own darling caprices and further his dearest designs.

Another Graft Prosecution

What these caprices and designs are is a legitimate subject of speculation. On the Flannery trial Older testified that the defendant once proposed to him that they "cut up the town" between them, and now it is said that their reconciliation gives color to the report that Older rejected the proposal because he wanted Flannery to go and get a reputation. But this is nothing more than vagrant gossip. It comes from no authoritative source. Somewhat more credible, because sponsored by men more or less in touch with inside things political is the report that Flannery has a grievance against the McCarthy administration, and that Older expects him to play the part that was played by Roy Golden in the Schmitz-Ruef drama. Older it appears hopes to start another graft prosecution. And some of his friends say that he will profit by experience; that he will not pursue the discredited methods that disgusted the community when Langdon was district attorney. On the other hand he has his friends who say that with Lawlor and Dunne on the bench it will be impossible for him to let the law take its course. They appreciate the fact that he delights in the refinements of intrigue, in the tortuous labyrinths of political maneuvering, and that he is always in danger of being defeated by the superfluity of his Machivaellian subtlety.

Some Sensational Stories

But whatever happens it is quite certain that there is disquiet among the little coterie of chevaliers d'industrie who are suspected of being engaged in some very profitable enterprises that are being conducted with or without the connivance of the police. One hears many sensational stories these days. There is a story afloat about a saloon where tainted money paid by gamblers and crooks is deposited and distributed. There is a story about a lawyer who levanted with some of the swag. There is also the story of the discomfiture of this coterie caused by the aggressiveness of District Attorney Fickert who is said to have interfered somewhat with well laid plans. But these stories the Bulletin is not publishing. Fickert having defeated Heney is not to be given credit in the Bulletin for good work. And if he is receiving the support of Mayor McCarthy of course there will be very little news worthy of exploitation. The fact is that very much of the most interesting news regarding the doings of the captains of the underworld is suppressed nowadays. Quite as interesting as any other story is that which deals with the inspiration of Flannery's chief grievance. This story is to the effect that all his trouble grew out of a quarrel with the men who have been exploiting the gambling and other luxuriant fields. As police commissioner he was inclined to repudiate their claims on the administration and they resolved upon revenge. They bided their time. They knew that Fremont Older was very much interested in preventing an investigation of the death of Chief Biggy. Flannery insisted upon inquiring into that matter. Older was immediately given the information about Flannery's relations with confidence operators, and the Bulletin speedily opened its batteries on the police commissioner. How interesting are the glimpses that one occasionally obtains of the motives and machinations of our civic patriots! How instructive to take observations of the psychological phenomena explanatory of their choice of company!

Why Johnson is Running

Through the medium of the current Hampton's Magazine one is afforded a glimpse of Mr. Older's subtlety. Though we know all about this quality in Mr. Older the glimpse is of some importance for the sidelight that is thrown on the gubernatorial campaign; also, by reason of the fact that it enables us to perceive that the Graft Prosecution's indefatigable press bureau is still busy. One article in Hampton's spreads the fame of that charming woman Mrs. Gerberding, who romped ecstatically in the limelight in the days when the knitters were exhibiting their graces of mind and heart. Another article is devoted to Mr. Older. According to this article all the machinery of politics and justice in California is being employed in an effort to send him to jail merely because he slandered W. S. Tevis. Nothing is said about Older's efforts to keep out of jail; about how he rigged up a mock trial before Judge Dooling and procured the appellate court of the Sacramento district to grant him a change of venue. The readers of Hampton's are not told that he slandered Tevis to gratify the spleen of his master Jimmy Phelan. But they are told (and here's where we get the glimpse) that the only uncertain element in the program of Older's undoing is Hiram Johnson. The election of Mr. Johnson, says Hampton's, will disappoint Older's enemies, for in the event of his election they will not "have the satisfaction they expect to derive from looking through the bars at their most persistent, fearless and effective enemy." This is certainly good news, bearing out in a measure what I have said about the inspiration of Mr. Johnson's candidacy. Mr. Johnson says he is running for governor to drive the railroad out of politics. From Hampton's we learn that one of the things he is running for is to defeat the ends of justice in the interest of the most fragrant flower in California chivalry. For Mr. Johnson's benefit marked copies of Hampton's should be sent to every voter in the State.

The Colonel and Mrs. "Ducksey"

Who do you suppose is going to be chief character witness for Mrs. "Ducksey" Rosenbaum in her libel suit against the New York World? You could never guess in a thousand years. When you hear it you may not believe it, but there is absolutely no doubt about the fact. None other than Colonel ————. Ah! Colonel Kowalsky? You're wrong. Colonel Kowalsky is the character witness of royalty and has not officiated since King Leopold went, let us charitably hope, where the good niggers from the Congo go. Well then, Colonel Trumbo? Wrong again. Colonel Trumbo prefers his picture gallery to the law courts. As you will never be able to guess aright I am going to tell you. It is simply Colonel Jim Lankershim of Los Angeles, the same who is president of a bank and proprietor of the Lankershim Hotel. For aught I know Colonel Lankershim may be even now making his deposition in regard to the immaculate character of Mrs. "Ducksey" Rosenbaum. That is to say, he may be making it if certain influential citizens of Los Angeles have not dissuaded him from his chivalrous undertaking. Strong indeed will be the arguments which will be advanced by Colonel Lankershim's friends to prevent him from playing Don Quixote to the Dulcinea del Toboso of Mrs. "Ducksey," but I doubt whether they will be efficacious. Colonel Lankershim professes great admiration for Mrs. "Ducksey" and is resolved to go to her assistance in the crisis of her career. John Slate, the star man of the New York World who was out here to investigate the past of Mrs. "Ducksey," did not make the slightest dent in the armor of Colonel Lankershim's resolve. "Supposing you were convinced that such and such and so and so were the case," argued John Slate to the colonel, "would you still persist in your determination?" To which the colonel with the glitter of pertinacity in his eye: "My deposition will be in New York at the proper time."

A Story About Slate

Just what John Slate accomplished during his recent visit to this city I am not in a position to state. I have heard that he found men who were familiar with the career of Mrs. "Ducksey" strangely reluctant to state what they knew for affidavit purposes. But John Slate is a man of determination and probably accomplished his purpose. He is not easily discouraged—and thereby hangs a good newspaper story of the Yanko-Spanko war, to borrow a Bierce phrase. John Slate of the New York World and Nick Biddle of the New York Herald were sent by their papers to watch Sampson demolish Cervera's fleet. It was hard to get near enough to the Spanish ships to tell whether they were steam schooners or dreadnaughts—they had such an elusive way about them. But Slate and Biddle accomplished the feat. At the little Danish island of St. Thomas they chartered a little steamer—for a pleasure cruise—and found an extreme pleasure in sneaking up to the Spanish ships and photographing them as well as securing information which their respective papers took great pleasure in printing. The Spaniards did not like it a bit, however; it complicated the job of eluding Sampson. So they put a price on the heads of Slate and Biddle and one day when the little Danish steamer was riding at anchor in the port of St. Thomas a big black Spanish cruiser poked her nose into the harbor and demanded that the Danish authorities surrender the two newspapermen. Here was a pretty pickle. While the negotiations were going on Slate and Biddle carefully investigated the harbor and discovering an inside passage that was furthest removed from the Spanish guns quietly sneaked out of the harbor under cover of night. It was not long before the Spanish cruiser was in pursuit, sending shells across their bow and bearing down upon them with the certainty of death and the tax collector. To add to the fascination of the occasion the crew of the little Danish steamer tried to mutiny at the unexpected outcome of their pleasure cruise. Just when Slate and Biddle were thinking of sending telepathic messages of "Thirty" to their papers the American cruiser Yale appeared on the horizon and took the Spaniard on in such deadly earnest that the newspaper boat made an easy getaway. After that sort of experience I imagine that Slate finds investigating Mrs. "Ducksey" Rosenbaum rather an easy, not to say exhilarating, task.

"Well, doctor, boy or girl?"

"For the Last Time, I Tell You, Mike—"

It looks as though they have really said it for the last time. Rumor along the Rialto has it that Kolb and Dill are going to dissolve their partnership in the manufacture of laughter. The rumor so far is not confirmed. Theatrical rumors never are till they have ceased to be rumors and become realities. But there is every reason to think that it is true. As I have heard the story, it is a disagreement over Magner, their manager. Kolb wants to get rid of Magner while Dill says that Magner has helped them to make a fortune and ought to be retained. Thousands of times Kolb and Dill have disagreed behind the footlights over matters seemingly more important than this, but it seems that their relations are very badly strained and that the quarrel will not be decided by a slapstick or a kick in the stomach. The situation is complicated by the fact that John Cort has the two comedians booked to open his new theater in Seattle with twelve weeks of farce. I believe that Kolb is willing to play there alone if Cort wants him. I have also heard that Kolb has made overtures to a Dutch comedian in San Jose by the name of Mack and that if Mack joins Kolb he will change his name to Dell. Kolb and Dell! It would never mean as much as Kolb and Dill! It is interesting to know that Kolb and Dill made $57,000 last year and that they have lots of money invested in good San Francisco real estate.

History Repeats Itself

I was talking to an old-timer about this rumored row between the two comedians with whom every San Franciscan has laughed and he reminded me that these quarrels between team-mates are almost the invariable rule of the theatrical profession. Sooner or later the closest of friends tire of playing together. He attributed it to the artistic temperament but I see no reason to lug in that muchly overworked term. He named some of those who separated after years together—Weber and Field, the only rivals of Kolb and Dill, Harrigan and Hart, Hallan and Hart, Robson and Crane, Donnelly and Gerard and Ward and Volkes. He was not sure whether Williams and Walker were still together. He added that the only two teams he knew of that had weathered every storm together were McIntyre and Heath who have been inseparable—despite many attempts to separate them—for thirty-five years and Montgomery and Stone who have been close friends and associates for fifteen years.

Which is the Better Comedian?

Now that it is practically certain that Kolb and Dill will go their respective ways the question arises, Which will prove the more successful of the two? Will the tall man, Clarence Kolb, find that he needs the little man, Max Dill, more than the little man needs the tall man? It is an interesting question upon which public opinion will be divided. Personally I think that Kolb is the better actor and that he will achieve a greater success than Dill. In the technical language used behind the scenes Dill has always been a "feeder" for Kolb, that is to say, he has supplied the opportunities of which Kolb availed himself for mirth-provoking purposes. When Dill appeared on the stage the audience instinctively waited for Kolb to come and do something to him, whereas Kolb carried many situations alone. This is an individual opinion, of course. There is no doubt that Kolb is the business man of the team. It was he who managed the company, attended to the booking. advertising and other details.

The Van Liew Case

Miss Ada Clark of Chico is deserving of much sympathy—principally for the reason that she has a brother. It was this brother, the Rev. C. Todd Clark, who precipitated the investigation of the question of Dr. C. C. Van Liew's fitness for the high position which he occupies in the public school department. Whatever the outcome of this investigation may be, it can hardly be gainsaid that it is very unfortunate for Ada Clark that she figured therein as the complainant. This sixteen year old girl is not deserving of the notoriety that she has received. Admitting that Dr. Van Liew attempted a wanton caress he did her less injury than has been done by the brother who brought the incident to public attention, causing her to be involved in a bitter village feud and a very unsavory scandal. The Rev. Clark's lack of discretion is far more unpardonable than Van Liew's lack of self-restraint.

A teacher there was named Van Liew,
A maid for a kiss he would siew;
But the maid when embraced,
Flung his arm from her waced,
And raised a great hullabaliew.

The Knitters of Chico

Miss Clark is especially unfortunate in not having the sympathy of her sex, and doubly so in having the scorn of the knitters of Chico. For the knitters of Chico are ardent, nay, furious partisans. They are women of precisely the same temperament as the knitters of our graft prosecution. Emancipated from all the effeminate qualities that the foolish poets have rhapsodized about, the knitters of Chico have given some interesting exhibitions of village partisanship. "To curb the passions' maddening sway" is not the delight of these virago queens that express their emotions in hisses and jeers and tempestuous applause. "O woman! Lovely woman!" says the poet, "nature made thee to temper man; we had been brutes without you." But all poets have a conception of womanhood that credits the sex with giving earth its charm, life its zest, with having but one task, the task to bless and to be blest. The poets see nothing but tenderness, gentleness and amiability in the sex. They don't know anything about knitters, the fire-eyed regulators of society, the stern, uncompromising dames whose disposition it is to heap coals of fire where they may be considered to do the most good. Of such are the women of Chico who congregate daily at the Van Liew investigation to wring the heart of a sixteen year old girl and bring tears of humiliation to the eyes of an aged father.

The Psychology of It

A melancholy spectacle this, that the town of Chico has supplied, one about which psychologists might discourse entertainingly. Are these women influenced by intuition as the sex usually is? Do they perceive through the medium of their extra sense that the girl is a prevaricator, that the man is innocent? Or are they envious of the girl whose charms of person excited the interest of so handsome a man, so gallant and cultured an individual as Professor Van Liew? Perhaps the hissing dames have been variously affected. Perhaps some of them are merely partisans for no particular reason. For Professor Van Liew has long been the central figure in a village feud. Society has been in a ferment ever since he took charge of the Normal School. Cliques angled for the prestige of his society. When he went to a church on a Sunday the congregations of all the other churches knew about it, and they were astonished that he should exhibit such poor taste in the matter of religion. One day he delivered a lecture and touched on religion. All the parsons in town agreed that he wasn't orthodox, and they were shocked. The professor tried in vain to conciliate all factions. To make matters worse he affected the air of austerity, and the gossips said that they couldn't be fooled by his puritanical behaviour in Chico; they knew how he behaved whenever he went to San Francisco. He tried to give the impression that he had no taste for liquor, but as he sometimes indulged on the quiet, the saloon men and their friends pronounced him a hypocrit. So Van Liew has had a pretty hard time in the home of the knitters.

The Omnipresent Octopus

The Van Liew case has afforded the enemies of Governor Gillett an opportunity to deal in sinister insinuations at his expense. It developed during the investigation that he employed a detective to obtain evidence for the prosecution. This detective is on the pay-roll of the Southern Pacific Company. When this fact was brought out the attorneys for the defense acted as though they had made a very important discovery, and the newspapers that are unfriendly to the Governor gave it as much prominence as possible, intimating that a circumstance of prodigious significance had been dragged from stygian darkness into the blinding light of day. The inference was suggested that the Octopus had a hand in the prosecution of Van Liew, that the school principal was being pursued by that awful monster the very mention of which makes the whole State tremble. Incidentally it was deftly insinuated that the hiring of the railroad detective was conclusive of an unholy alliance between the corporation and the Chief Magistrate of the State. The testimony showed that the Governor had asked the Chief of Police of Sacramento to procure a detective for him, and that the railroad hawkshaw was recommended by the Chief and by that functionary recommended to the Governor. A simple enough explanation, but it did not silence the artists in slander of the daily press. That most enthusiastic of calumniators, the Daily Call, went so far in the indulgence of its favorite vice as to devote an editorial leader to a discussion of the matter.

"The last time I was in this town somebody forged my name to a check," said the man who had just signed the hotel register.

"How did they find out what your name was, sir?" inquired the clerk, carefully studying the signature on the book.

The Sidestepping of Pinchot

Frank Short, the Fresno attorney, who is campaigning for Congressman McKinlay, has abandoned all hope of ever being able to lure Mr. Gifford Pinchot into a debate on the question whether conservation is beneficial to the American people. That the distinguished forester recognizes the Fresno attorney as a dangerous opponent is evident from the fact that he has frequently warned the dearly beloved people against him. But being a reformer he does not deign to refute any of Short's arguments or challenge the accuracy of any of Short's statements. He prefers to call names. At the Conservation Congress in Spokane he referred to Short as the representative of that mysterious intangible bogie, the power trust, and in Los Angeles recently he advised the people to beware of Short. In giving this advice Mr. Pinchot is doubtless sincere; for he follows it religiously himself. He has been evading Short for some months and proving himself an expert in sidestepping. One day they met in Washington and the forester said, "I see you have been flouting my policies."

"I don't know whether they belong to you or not," said Short, "but I certainly have been flouting conservation policies before a committee of Congress."

"I'd like to meet you before that committee," the forester observed.

"I'm going away tomorrow," said Short, "but I will be glad to meet you in about two months."

They parted. And then it occurred to Short that it would be advisable to postpone his departure. He went immediately to the chairman of the committee that was considering conservation and had the subject reopened, and an invitation sent to Pinchot to address the committee on the following day. Pinchot left Washington as soon as the invitation was received. Some weeks later when the forester made some public allusion to Short the attorney wrote him a letter offering to meet him in any city in the country before any audience he might select to debate the question, "Is conservation beneficial to the American people?" Pinchot answered the letter saying that it was impossible for him to make an engagement at that time. That was before he found that he had time to come west in the interest of Hiram Johnson.

Boutwell Dunlap, Doctor of Laws

The Catholic University at Washington recently conferred the imposing degree of doctor of laws on Boutwell Dunlap. That in itself is not a particularly interesting statement to the world at large. A good many of us have more degrees, earned and honorary, than we know what to do with. It is much more interesting to the world and the rest of mankind—as President Buchanan liked to put it—to learn that Boutwell Dunlap is one of our most promising lawyers, one of our most earnest scholars and consul at this port for the Argentine Republic to boot. But there is one interesting fact connected with that degree of doctor of laws. Boutwell Dunlap was what is known as "a student on leave" of the Catholic University. He studied there for his degree of bachelor of laws and began practicing law here with the understanding that when he wrote a satisfactory thesis he would get his doctor's degree. Dunlap found his practice and consular work so pressing that he had little time for that thesis and being worried, he wrote to the authorities of his alma mater to ascertain his status. The reply surprised him. The reverend fathers said that it would be unnecessary for him to write a legal thesis because they had examined his bibliography of the Chinese question and had found it so much more valuable a work than any musty old legal thesis could possibly be that they were going to give him his doctor's degree on the strength of it. Which they promptly proceeded to do. The book in question is one of the most important contributions to California scholarship that has been published in many a day. It is entitled the "Bibliography of the Chinese Question in America" and is considered by experts exhaustive of its subject. Alec Robertson published it. It was the joint work of Boutwell Dunlap and Robert L. Cowan. Which naturally suggests the question, Why doesn't somebody give "Bob" Cowan a degree?

Victor Blue, Fire Fighter

Commander Victor Blue of the United States gunboat Yorktown happened to be in Portland during the recent conflagration which wiped out a lot of valuable business property. It is opportunity which makes heroes and when the opportunity came to Commander Blue he seized it with heroic resolve. When the fire broke out Commander Blue ordered his men ashore to fight it and the assistance which he thereby rendered to the Portland authorities and fire fighters has won him many sincere encomiums from the citizens of Portland. It is not necessary to say that Commander Blue is well known in San Francisco. He is almost as well known here as his brother, Dr. Rupert Blue who will always have a place in the history of American sanitation on account of his work in this city.

Exeunt Two Shakespearians

It is not surprising that our papers have devoted so little space to the death of Dr. Frederick J. Furnivall and Dr. William J. Rolfe. As a matter of fact, did they notice the deaths at all? The passing of two great Shakespearian scholars is not regarded as possessing particular news value by journals which devote pages to a prizefight. Yet who can estimate the value of their services to Great Britain and the United States? Both men lived to advanced ages, thereby proving that strenuous mental habits are not inconsistent with vigorous health. Both men made Shakespeare easier to understand for youthful students. Their critical and explanatory editions of the poet claim for them a position in that great company of commentators which began with Pope and Johnson and Malone and includes Dr. Dowden of Dublin and Furness of the Variorum. Dr. Rolfe in particular by his well known forty volume edition of the plays and poems made Shakespeare a delight to the young. Those familiar red volumes with their absorbingly interesting notes and their helpful illustrations make the study of Shakespeare a delight. Furnivall was perhaps a deeper scholar than Rolfe and it may be that experts will adjudge his Chaucerian labors as of more value than his Shakespearian, but both men achieved highly and the world of learning is the poorer for their deaths.

Labor Council has issued a circular in which it states that when this "fight is over, and Portland business ruined, this free labor will move to Seattle, Spokane and San Francisco, where employers of labor have common sense." This is a threat which should not unduly worry Portland. Business has never yet been ruined in any city for lack of workingmen; it is the lack of business which ruins the workingmen. A general movement of the unionists of Portland upon San Francisco is not likely to take place, for the simple reason that there is not enough work for them here. Owing to San Francisco's labor troubles manufacturers have taken their work to those coast cities which offer more favorable labor conditions. While Portland need not be deceived by the threat of the Central Labor Council, it should be glad that the threat has been publicly proclaimed. Now that Portland knows the purpose of organized labor to rule or ruin Portland, its leading citizens can act accordingly. The example of San Francisco will teach them what not to do.

Tia Juana Bull-Fighting

A returned vacationist who spent a couple of weeks at beautiful Coronado has registered a vow that he will never again be tempted to a bull-fight until he goes to Spain and has an opportunity to see the real thing. This vow is the result of a visit to Tia Juana a few Sundays ago. Visitors at San Diego always develop an intense desire to witness a bull-fight and in company with several other enthusiasts my friend crossed the line to satisfy his curiosity. Flaming posters announced that a celebrated bull-fighter from Spain would subdue three ferocious bulls and the arena was thronged with American visitors, Mexicans and half-breeds. My friend says that the first bull let loose was the most emaciated and woe-begone beast he had ever seen. He advanced wearily into the arena and when the matador snapped a cloak in his face, galloped off in terror. The second bull was really quite spirited but when he began to display symptoms of aggressiveness the matador refused to tackle him and he was let out of the arena. The third bull my informant describes as a very docile beast whom the matador approached with ostentatious bravery. This however did not deceive the spectators and they began to taunt him for his cowardice. He replied in Spanish that if anybody disapproved of his work he had better come into the ring and fight the bull himself. No sooner had the words left his lips than a score of Mexicans jumped into the arena. They tore the clothes from the matador and chased the bull all over the ring until he fell down exhausted. Then three of them climbed on his back and belabored him with their heels while the rest of the crowd expressed their opinion of the matador by giving him a beating that sent him to the hospital. My friend says that the free fight was exciting enough but he had gone to see a bull-fight, not a Donnybrook, and returned to Coronado thoroughly disgusted.

A Rumor About Delmas

In certain legal circles it is a matter of speculation whether our Napoleonic barrister Delphin M. Delmas will be called East to take charge of the case of Porter Charlton, the young banker who murdered his beautiful wife Mary Scott Castle Charlton on Lake Como in Italy. It is the opinion in these circles that if the negotiations with Italy place the liberty of young Charlton in jeopardy Delmas will be summoned across the continent and maybe across the ocean to defend him. There is no doubt that Delmas made a great impression in New York as a criminal lawyer during the first trial of Harry Thaw. It was he, of course, who invented the term "dementia Americana" which really summarized the whole Delmas line of defense. I have heard competent lawyers say that if Delmas had been allowed to handle the case alone he would have secured an acquittal. At any rate there seems to be reason to suppose that his name is being considered by the father of the youthful uxoricide. It would be a significant thing if Henry McPike, Delmas' partner, should go East about this time. McPike handles the business end of the firm and it was he who conducted the negotiations with the Thaw family which ended in the retaining of Delmas. Meanwhile Delmas is devoting considerable thought to his gorgeous neckties and is whipping the streams of his native State for trout.

Proselytizing Among Journalists

Two newspapers published in the interior of the State have been converted to Johnson and reform. Which isn't a bad showing for the interior press. Of course there are other papers in the interior that have been standing for the Johnson brand of reform ever since Rudolph Spreckels began appealing to the conscience of susceptible journalists, but of only two can it be said that they permitted themselves to be prevailed upon to give their principles a violent wrench in the dust and heat of the campaign; only two thus far. The campaign is approaching the end, but there is still time to make converts, and there are several editors in the interior who are worth reclaiming from ways that are dark.

The Consistency of Hearst

I read in the Examiner that "responding to the demands of civic and religious organizations throughout the country to suppress prize fight pictures and uphold the laws intended to prevent prize fighting, the Hearst newspapers have started an organized movement that will be nation-wide in scope." Which induces me to ask myself a few questions, such as: Why did Hearst bill the city in advance of the fight with three-sheet posters containing pictures of Jeffries and Johnson and announcing that the Examiner's corps of trained writers would give the best account of the fight? Why did Hearst devote thirteen pages of the Examiner of July 5 to pictures and descriptions of the fight? Why did Hearst boast afterwards in the Examiner that he had published the earliest and best picture of the knock-out? Why did he boast of the manner in which these pictures were rushed to San Francisco by special train and carrier pigeons? Why did Hearst on July 4 supply one mob at Third and Market with bulletins of the fight and another mob in a big hall with living pictures duplicating every blow? But what's the use? Consistency hides all her jewelry when Mr. Hearst comes in sight.

The Morals of Waukesha

The whole town of Waukesha, Wis., is "in bad," with its morals gone wrong and no way under the sun or under the law to revise them. A mineral water concern out there, with a sinful desire to attract attention, posted a beautiful billboard picture of a lady who really, to put it plainly, needed the earnest and instant attention of a modiste. The City Council at once made a demand that the lady either give an order to her dressmaker or else get outside the corporate limits of Waukesha. The president of the mineral water company was cited to appear and "show cause." He did so. He also showed that the lady of bewitching smile and no clothes was simply a photographic reproduction, borrowed from the Great Seal of the City of Waukesha. This Great Seal is hung in every saloon that has a license and in places not so lax, but nobody thought of questioning the lady's modesty until she began to boost mineral water. The "drys" profess to see in this an attempt to discredit temperance drinks.

Where Does the Stork Come In?

When one of the newspapers reported last week that Mr. James D. Phelan was to be reconciled to his brother-in-law Mr. Frank Sullivan, it imparted a heavy coloring of mystery to the affair by stating in a headline that the stork was to be a potent feature of the reunion. The curiosity excited by this interesting statement in the headline was not satisfied by any details in the body of the article. There was absolutely no mention of a stork in the article. Reference either to the ciconia alba which builds its nests on the chimneys of Nuremberg or to the species sacred to Lucina which brings its precious offering of pink and white humanity to blushing brides was not to be found by the most careful reader. Wherefore I am disposed to read between the lines of the mysterious article the better to interpret the mysterious headline. Is the stork referred to a bird of such elusive passage that only the reader familiar with the most intimate details of Mr. Phelan's life can understand the relevance of the reference? I would be inclined to think so did I not know Mr. Phelan to be a bachelor. The stork presupposes marriage, being a most conventional bird, and matrimony is an experience which Mr. Phelan has so far eschewed. I am afraid I must apply to a member of the Family Club for the elucidation of this mystery, for the Family clubmen are authorities on storks.

The Scene of the Reconciliation

I do not know what particular spot in Europe Mr. Phelan and Mr. Sullivan will choose for the historic scene of their reconciliation. Doubtless they will make a picturesque selection for both gentlemen have a keen eye for striking effects. Without presuming to offer a suggestion I cannot refrain from saying that to my mind the most appropriate place in Europe for the impressive ceremony would be a certain spot in the province of Hainaut in Belgium, a spot with which Mr. Sullivan is as familiar as he is, let us say, with the history of the Hibernia Bank. I refer to the famous battlefield of Fontenoy! There where the Irish Brigade met and defeated the bloody Duke of Cumberland let Mr. Sullivan meet and embrace Mr. Phelan! 'Twould add to the wealth of associations of that sacred ground. The two gentlemen might even be photographed shaking hands in front of the tablet to the memory of the Irish Brigade erected on the battlefield by Mr. Sullivan. Of that tablet a curious story is told. 'Tis said that when it was first erected it bore an inscription in English whereupon the Belgian peasants, thinking that it commemorated the Sassenach, tore it down in fury. Mr. Sullivan then substituted an inscription in Gaelic, a language which he is said to speak as fluently as French, and it has never been disturbed since.

Mr. Phelan's Eye Trouble

Mr. James D. Phelan has just recovered from a distressing weakness of the eyes which caused him and all his friends who learned of his condition considerable anxiety. In order to receive the best treatment Mr. Phelan forsook the continent of Europe for London where he was under the care of a specialist. It was necessary for him to stay in a dark room during the crisis of his disorder. Late letters from Europe state that Mr. Phelan is now much improved and that he fears no permanent injury to his eyesight.

Children are Fashionable

One of my correspondents at Santa Barbara, the Mecca of the exclusives, informs me with a touch of cynicism that children are fashionable this summer. The statement has no bearing whatever on the mooted question of race suicide but simply means that in the swagger sets it is not considered unconventional to show a lively interest in one's offspring. This is a condition of affairs which affords me real pleasure, but at the same time I suspect that my cynical informant over-emphasizes a natural state of affairs. Even our most exclusive mothers and fathers are not devoid of humanity and it is hardly fair to point out that they are trying to make the summertime agreeable to their hopefuls. My correspondent writes that Mrs. Andrew Welch is often seen romping with her two beautiful children in the company of Mrs. Charles Harley and her three little boys, adding that they all go swimming before breakfast and all enter the dining room of the Potter together, freshly flushed from their morning dip. He states that Mrs. George Newhall always has her two little boys at the table with her and that she takes the eldest into the surf; that Fred McNear never enters the water without his little son; and that the Frank Deerings are accompanied by their young daughter wherever they go. These statements do not surprise me in the least. During the busy whirl of the winter season mothers cannot see so much of their children and must entrust them to the care of their nurses, but during vacation time it is only natural that they should have them continually about them. To say that children are fashionable is a cynical way of stating half a truth.

Charming Bathers

I asked a friend just up from Santa Barbara which of the bathers appeared to the best advantage on the sands and choosing to misunderstand my question he replied with a number of racy thumb-nail sketches of the men, sketches which made it apparent that however Apollo-like they may be after their tailors have corrected the natural deficiencies of their figures they are not as a rule prepossessing in swimming costume. I am not going to name any names, however. I told my friend that the question had reference to the women at Santa Barbara and he replied that where so many were charming it would be impossible to pick out the queen. He went so far as to hazard the opinion that Miss Helene Irwin, Miss Julia Langhorne and Mrs. William Sherwood were worthy of special mention and allowing his enthusiasm to run away with him for a moment, even compared one of them to Miss Annette Kellerman, the "perfect woman." For fear of bringing a tempest about my brow I shall refrain from repeating her name. He told me that Mrs. Stewart Edward White's moonlight picnic was a charming affair and that it was enlivened by riding on surf boards, a sport in which some of the ladies proved quite expert. To do it properly it was necessary to doff the skirts of their bathing suits.

The Strenuous Miss Crocker

Miss Jennie Crocker is establishing a record to rival the strenuous career of Alice Roosevelt Longworth who is said to have slept four hours out of every twenty-four during her White House days. Miss Crocker flitted to Santa Barbara on a Friday, home again on Monday morning, entertained at luncheon at the St. Francis that day and with her guests who were Mrs. Walter and Mrs. Peter Martin and others spent the afternoon at the Orpheum. Following this Miss Crocker had a brief period in which to change her frock before going to Mrs. Walter Martin's dinner and later to a box party at the Columbia. Supper closed the day. On Tuesday Miss Crocker returned to Uplands. Wednesday she was back in town looking fresh and girlish in a simple pale blue linen suit with a small white hat and lace veil, and Thursday she was at Uplands once more. Friday saw her again en route to Santa Barbara where the whirl is merrily on led by such indefatigable beauties as the Newhall girls and Mrs. Fred McNear.

Mrs. Graham's Glass Auto

The miniature crystal palaces which are the latest thing in automobiles have found a number of American purchasers in Paris, according to the foreign correspondents who keep us in touch with affairs in Europe. They are a little late however in noting the fact as it is quite a year since Mrs. William Miller Graham astonished the natives at Santa Barbara with her glass coach, the only one, I believe, in California. Mrs. Graham secured it on her trip abroad last summer and with it came a French chauffeur in maroon livery. The back, sides and front of the car are of plate glass that extends from top to flooring and gives an unobstructed view of costumes within. Incidentally the occupants may have an unobstructed view of events and scenery without. In the six months Mrs. Graham flashed her car about Santa Barbara there was no abatement of popular interest in each succeeding appearance. On her return, fresh from London triumphs, exhibitions of the glass coach will probably be resumed. Since the success of Mrs. Graham in England interest has been awakened in her local career. I am told the Grahams first appeared in Cincinnati whence they came to California, living for a time in Ross Valley where they were socially unimportant. From there they went to Pasadena with the intention of building a home and becoming permanent residents. But the atmosphere of the place proved uncongenial and the Grahams migrated to Santa Barbara where they purchased a promentory that juts into the bay and erected an Italian villa thereon. This, I am told, is soon to be replaced by a marble palace. William Graham is said to have won and lost several fortunes, and in the past few years to have cleared six millions on some of his oil deals.

The Mrs. Bruguiere That Was

The lady who was Mrs. Pedar Bruguiere before the doctor's present marriage has just arrived in Newport for a visit with Mrs. Bruguiere senior. Gossip from that fashionable colony declares that she is to wed William Burden whose young wife's tragic death by suicide shocked New York society a few years ago. This gossip is a little surprising because it is only a month since we were informed that Henry Clews Jr. was a suitor for this lady's hand in Paris, or rather, that he intended to be a suitor as soon as the divorce court freed him from the present Mrs. Clews. He too is at Newport, having crossed from Europe a week or two preceding Mrs. Bruguiere's migration from Paris. Whether the Mrs. Bruguiere that was will marry Burden or Clews is a subject on which there is much speculation. Meanwhile Emil Bruguiere pursues his insouciant way in Paris whence comes the announcement that another recently completed comic opera of his composition will be produced in America next Fall.

A Few Notes from Paris

A correspondent writes me from Paris that the gay capital of the world is full of Americans just now, among them many from San Francisco. He says that the Frank Carolans are occupying the most expensive suite at the Hotel Bristol and that they have run over to Oberammergau for the Passion Play. Mrs. Truxtun Beale and her sister are very prominent in the American set. Nance O'Neil is resting there after her arduous season in New York. Frank Carroll Giffen, one of our well known music teachers, is in Paris for a short visit after an enjoyable stay in Florence. In Florence he was the guest of the Baroness von Pelka and her son in their beautiful Medici palace and as the von Pelkas are of old and noble lineage he met many interesting people. In Parisian musical circles Marcia Van Dresser and Mrs. Minnie Saltzmann Stevens are being made much of. Mrs. Stevens is hailed as a great Brunhilde.

Is it a Hoodoo Regiment?

Has bad luck marked the Twelfth Infantry for its own? This question was put to me the other day by an army officer of superstitious tendencies and when he had explained its import I was impressed with the patness of his query. The Twelfth Infantry is a regiment stationed at Fort William McKinley in Manila and it has been very much in the limelight recently on account of several sensational affairs which resulted in court martials. Nothing is so much dreaded by officers who have the good name of their regiment at heart as a court martial and when a regiment has had five court martials the talk of a hoodoo is not unnatural. The Twelfth Infantry is in the throes of its fifth court martial. The first to be tried was Captain Frank D. Wickham. Then came First Lieutenant Frank B. Davis. Then Lieutenant-Colonel Robert F. Ames was made the subject of charges on account of the suicide of Second Lieutenant C. M. Janney, the husband of beautiful Madeline McKissick. Out of that affair grew the court martial of Chaplain John E. Dallam of which I spoke two weeks ago. And now comes the news that Brigadier-General Ramsay D. Potts, commanding the Department of Luzon, has ordered a court martial to try Colonel William H. C. Bowen. It is thought that the charges against this old Indian fighter are based on the allegation that he violated the regulations against the unauthorized use of an army transport in obtaining passage for a person not a member of his immediate family.

Championship Tennis at Del Monte

The interest in the tennis tournament to be held September 2 to 10 at Hotel Del Monte will center in the meeting of three women players, Miss May Sutton, Miss Hazel Hotchkiss and Miss Florence Sutton. May Sutton, undefeated champion woman player of the world, lost her title as United States champion by default last year. In like manner she lost the Pacific Coast championship. Miss Florence Sutton has defeated Miss Hotchkiss, thereby becoming champion of the Pacific States. Since then, however, Miss Hotchkiss has won the national woman's championship in the East where May Sutton did not play. She also defeated May Sutton in the games at Los Angeles. She has not played against Florence Sutton since last season. So the games at which these players will meet during the month of sports at Del Monte promise to be very interesting.

In the Limelight

Mr. Nat. J. Landsberger, the well known violinist of this city, performed with Mr. Pierre Douillet, pianist and Mrs. Nitalia Douillet, soprano, in a concert under the auspices of the Chautauqua Assembly of Pacific Grove last Friday evening. There was a large gathering of music lovers which showed unusual appreciation of all the numbers on the carefully selected program. Mr. Landsberger rendered among other things the exquisite Am Meer of Schubert-Wilhelmj and the Airs Russes of Wieniawski. The Wieniawski number in particular aroused intense enthusiasm and Mr. Landsberger was called upon for three encores.

Recent San Francisco arrivals at Hotel del Coronado included: Dr. and Mrs. N. S. Stern, Mr. and Mrs. J. M. Ryan, Will Hoff, A. L. Clark, Miss Molly Lahey, Mr. and Mrs. M. J. O'Keefe, George W. Eimers, Marie Witte, Charles E. George, H. M. Myers, Mr. and Mrs. Emil Blankenberg, V. Condory, M. D., H. L. Bascome, Miss Jeannette Woolner, Miss May Woolner and Miss Sophie Stoltz.

Black and White, A Shakespearian Skit

Offered as a Suggestion to the Rev. Edwards Davis

(Edwards Davis who used to act in the pulpit and now preaches on the Orpheum Circuit cannot use his present vehicle, "The Picture of Dorian Gray" forever. He will need new material some day. To suggest a method of supplying his need the following bit of dramaturgy has been prepared. It is built on the same lines as Mr. Davis' skit. As he has dovetailed odd lines and passages of Wilde I have dovetailed odd lines and passages of Shakespeare. As he has shown no hesitation in altering Wilde's story to suit his purpose I have not feared to take liberties with Shakespeare to suit mine. There is as much originality in my work as in his. He changed the sex of Dorian Gray but I have been more considerate of my characters. To illustrate the method, which may be applied to any author, I have indicated the sources of the lines.)

By Edward F. O'Day

Cast of Characters:
Juliet, an Italian beauty.
Lady Macbeth, a Scotch flirt.
Hamlet, a Dane disguised as Othello, a Moor.

Scene: Juliet's boudoir in the Capulet mansion, Verona. The room is fitted with all the conveniences modern to the period which is middle Shakespearian. A rushlight burns and smokes and there are rushes on the wooden floor. The room opens on a balcony and outside a silken rope ladder can be heard flapping in the wind. Juliet sits in pensive thought of Romeo, brushing an occasional tear from her eye with the point of her sleeve. She shows no surprise when Hamlet disguised as Othello enters through the window from the balcony. She is used to gentlemen entering that way. Hamlet being fat perspires and pants but manages to bow.

Hamlet: This castle hath a pleasant seat; the air nimbly and sweetly recommends itself unto my gentle senses. (From Macbeth).

Juliet: But how came you in?

Hamlet: With love's light wings did I o'erperch these walls, for stony limits cannot hold love out. (Romeo and Juliet).

Juliet: What is in thy mind that makes thee stare thus? Wherefore breaks that sigh from the inward of thee? Is it for love of my Scotch cousin, Lady Macbeth? (Cymbeline).

Hamlet: I am giddy; expectation whirls me round. The imaginary relish is so sweet that it enchants my sense. What will it be when that the watery palate tastes indeed love's thrice repured nectar? (Troilus and Cressida).

Juliet: Lady Macbeth is making her ready; she'll come straight. You must be witty now. She does so blush as if she were frayed with a sprite. I'll fetch her. (Troilus and Cressida).

Exit Juliet. Hamlet surveys himself in a steel mirror to see that his makeup is still on and takes a paper from within the breast of his coat. He looks extremely melancholy even under the blackface.

Hamlet: Concealment like a worm i' the bud feeds on my damask cheek and my native hue is plastered o'er with the dark cast of Morocco. But all the world's a stage and in my time I've played many parts. Just now I play the lover, sighing like a furnace, with a woeful ballad made to Lady Macbeth's eyebrow. (Twelfth Night, Hamlet and As You Like It).

He fetches a deep sigh and reads:

When in the chronicle of wasted time
I see descriptions of the fairest wights,
And beauty making beautiful old rhyme
In praise of ladies dead and lovely knights,
Then, in the blazon of sweet beauty's best,
Of hand, of foot, of lip, of eye, of brow,
I see their antique pen would have expressed.
Even such a beauty as you master now. (Sonnets).

I'll rhyme her so eight years together, dinner and suppers and sleeping-hours excepted. Soft you now! The fair Lady Macbeth. (As You Like It, Hamlet).

Enter Juliet leading Lady Macbeth. You know she's a flirt as soon as you see her. Hamlet shows signs of bashfulness.

Juliet: Come, come, what need you blush? Shame's a baby. Here she is now. Swear the oaths now to her that you have sworn to me. (Troilus and Cressida).

Hamlet: O, thou dost teach the torches to burn bright! It seems you hang upon the cheek of night like a rich jewel in an Ethiop's ear. (Romeo and Juliet).

Lady Macbeth: Is this a nigger that I see before me? (Macbeth).

Despite the rebuff Hamlet gathers confidence and becomes very affected. He lifts his eyes ecstatically to heaven.

Hamlet: Dead shepherd, now I find thy saw of might, "Who ever loved that loved not at first sight?" (As You Like It).

He hands Lady Macbeth the verses.

O dear Lady Macbeth, I am ill at these numbers. I have not art to reckon my groans, but that I love thee best, O most best, believe it. (Hamlet).

Lady Macbeth (holding the paper upside down): This is the very false gallop of verses. Why do you infect yourself with them. My dear Juliet, let us tear him for his bad verses. (As You Like It, Julius Caesar).

Juliet: O Lady Macbeth, I know he doth deserve as much as may be yielded to a man. Put off your maiden blushes. (Much Ado, Henry V.).

Lady Macbeth: O villainous! I have looked upon the world for four times seven years; and since I could distinguish between a benefit and an injury I never found a man that knew how to love. Besides, these Moors are changeable in their wills. (Othello).

Hamlet: Doubt thou the stars are fire, doubt that the sun doth move; doubt truth to be a liar; but never doubt I love. (Hamlet).

Lady Macbeth: O proper stuff! These starts, impostors to true love, would well become a woman's story at a winter's fire. Why do you make such faces? (Macbeth).

Hamlet: O, she misuses me past the endurance of a block! She speaks poniards, and every word stabs. I cannot endure my lady's tongue. (Much Ado about Nothing).

Juliet (aside): A sharp wit matched with too blunt a will. (To Lady Macbeth) Tempt him not too far. Dissemble your hatred and swear your love. (Love's Labor Lost, Antony and Cleopatra, Richard III).

Lady Macbeth: He's an arrant counterfeit rascal. He's a pestilent complete knave. (Henry V., Othello).

Hamlet has been getting madder and madder. He can restrain himself no longer.

Hamlet: Get thee to a nunnery! Go thy ways to a nunnery! From this time be somewhat scantier of thy presence. (Hamlet).

Juliet (to Lady Macbeth): I pray you, speak not. He grows worse and worse. Question enrages him. Stand not upon the order of your going, but go at once. (Macbeth).

Lady Macbeth: Marry, I will.

Hamlet: If thou wilt needs marry, marry a fool. (Hamlet).

Lady Macbeth: I had rather hear my dog bark at a crow than hear you swear you love me. (Much Ado).

Hamlet: God keep your ladyship still in that mind, so some gentleman or other shall 'scape a predestinate scratched face. (Much Ado).

Lady Macbeth: Scratching could not make it worse, an 'twere such a face as yours. (Much Ado).

Hamlet: To be or not to be. That is the question. Whether 'tis noble in the mind to suffer the slings and arrows of outrageous insults. It cannot be that I am pigeon-livered and lack gall. Why, what an ass am I. Lady, I crave thy forgiveness. I grant thou canst outscold me. (Hamlet, King John).

Juliet: Lady Macbeth, be pitiful-hearted. Melt at his sweet tale. (Henry IV.).

Lady Macbeth: Lord, I could not endure a black husband with a beard on his face. (Much Ado)

Juliet: The prince of darkness is a gentleman. (King Lear).

Hamlet: If it were done when 'tis done, then 'twere well it were done quickly. (Tears off black mask and beard). Out, damned spots, out I say. (Macbeth).

Lady Macbeth } Hamlet! Hamlet!
Juliet }

Hamlet: Give me your pardon, ladies, I've done you wrong. The mask of night was on my face. But farewell compliment! Dost thou love me? (Hamlet, Romeo and Juliet).

Lady Macbeth: If that thy bent of love be honorable, thy purpose marriage, all my fortunes at thy foot I'll lay and follow thee, my lord, throughout the world.

Hamlet: Let Hercules himself do what he may, the cat will mew and dog will have his day.

They embrace rapturously while Juliet retires to the balcony to spoon with Romeo. Curtain.

Stage

The Orpheum This Week and Next

Miss Annette Kellerman, the "perfect woman," overshadows all other attractions at the Orpheum this week and there is little doubt that she will dominate the bill again next week. Miss Kellerman's act is good vaudeville, for it is novel, pleasing to the eye and continuously entertaining. The grace of this young woman is one of her chief merits. There is not an awkward moment in her performance and her method has nothing theatrical about it. It is rather the way of a maid disporting herself with unconscious abandon. Clifford and Burke are blackface comedians who cut up, dance and sing with unusual ability. Their kind are not as much in evidence in vaudeville as they were a few years ago and to confirmed Orpheumites they are therefore doubly welcome. The four Cliftons are splendid specimens of manhood and their act is one of the most cleancut specimens of acrobatic skill that has been presented for a long time. Harry Atkinson is a musical freak. He can imitate all sorts of musical instruments with a fidelity that is wonderful and at the same time with a comic suggestion that evokes a great deal of laughter. These are the hold-over acts for next week's bill and they are all good acts. The newcomers, according to the press agent, are a promising lot. There are the Four Fords who have been here before and whose dancing has always been received with great favor. It seems that they have just returned from a European tour and that in London they almost set the Thames afire with their clever footing. Granville and Rogers are a team of singers with incidental comedy. Again we are to see Thomas J. Ryan and Mary Richfield in Will Cressy's "Mag Haggerty's Visit." Opinion was divided as to the Mag Haggerty skits which they presented before. Mr. and Mrs. Jack McGreevy are respectively the "eccentric fiddler" and the "country maid." All in all, a bill that promises well.

—The First Nighter.

A Play with a Moral

Great indeed has been the success of Porter Emerson Browne's domestic drama "The Spendthrift" which Frederic Thompson will present at the Columbia for two weeks commencing Monday evening, August 1. The play is in four acts and four scenes and in its unfolding Mr. Browne's arraignment of frivolous domestic extravagance teaches a lesson that should be learned by all. The record of the play in New York attests its popularity. The company includes Doris Mitchell who plays the spendthrift wife. Lionel Adams who won his spurs as an actor of the first rank as "John Storm" in "The Christian," the title character in "The Man of the Hour" and several more equally important parts. Albert Sackett is another good actor. Vivian Martin, the ingenue, has been identified with a number of Broadway attractions and has had a wide stock experience. Others in the cast are Lizzie McCall, William Sullivan, Grace Gibbs and Forrest E. Orr. The scenes are laid in the home of a Fifth avenue millionaire and admit of artistic surroundings which have been taken full advantage of by Mr. Thompson.

Hackett as Don Caesar

"Don Caesar's Return" in which James K. Hackett will open his fourth week at the Alcazar next Monday evening is a new treatment of a famous stage character, Don Caesar de Bazan. This doughty Spanish cavalier furnishes much of the comedy element in Victor's Hugo's "Ruy Blas" and from that novel D'Ennery and Dumonois adapted their play which in turn served as the libretto of "Maritana," the ever-popular opera. Booth, Fechter and other great actors utilized "Don Caesar de Bazan" as a vehicle ere Mr. Hackett and Victor Mapes reconstructed it into the four-act version which ran an entire season in New York and now is to be presented in San Francisco for the first time. In the cast with Hackett will be Elizabeth Stewart (specially engaged for the part) as Maritana, Arthur Hoops as Don Jose, Will R. Walling as King Carlos, Catherine Calhoun as the armorer's apprentice and all the other Alcazar favorites in suitable roles. Elaborate staging is demanded by this play and some impressive pictures are promised. A street in old Madrid, the interior of the prison, a reception room in the chateau and a private chapel are shown.

"Zira" at Ye Liberty

For the third week of Izetta Jewel's special season the Bishop players at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, will offer "Zira," the play in which, it will be remembered, Margaret Anglin scored a notable success in New York the season before her appearances in "The Great Divide." The play is one of the powerful emotional dramas, being an adaptation of Wilkie Collins' well known novel, "The New Magdalen." The stage version has been prepared by Henry Miller and J. Hartley Manners and in every particular the production to be shown at Ye Liberty next week will be identical with that given by Miss Anglin. The title role offers Miss Jewel the strongest emotional role she has yet attempted across the bay, and associated with her in the presentation of the character will be all the well established favorites of the Oakland stock company. The play is announced for one week only after which comes "Such a Little Queen," one of New York's recent comedy hits which has never before been given in the West.

"Trovatore" at Idora

"Rigoletto" will be played by the Bevani company at Idora Park for the last time this evening (Saturday). Beginning with tomorrow's matinee "Trovatore" will be sung for the entire week. Bevani's aggregation of stars have scored a distinct triumph at the amusement park across the bay and nightly Idora's pretty little theater is packed with the lovers of operatic music. Grand opera at the prices charged at Idora has not been enjoyed since the old days before the fire.

Cohan and Harris' production of "The Fortune Hunter" is booked for an early engagement at the Columbia Theater. It is credited with being one of the firm's biggest money makers.

SWEETS IN THE COUNTRY

Geo. Haas & Sons' delicious candies are doubly appreciated in the country. Send a box to your friends on their vacation. Can be sent from any of Geo. Haas & Sons' four stores: Phelan Building, Fillmore at Ellis, Van Ness at Sutter and 28 Market Street, near Ferry.

Eloping Up-to-Date

The coatless man puts a careless arm
  Round the waist of the hatless girl,
While over the dustless, mudless roads
  In a horseless carriage they whirl.
Like a leadless bullet from hammerless gun,
  By smokeless powder driven,
They fly to taste the speechless joys
  By endless union given.

The only luncheon his coinless purse
  Affords to them the means
Is a tasteless meal of boneless cod,
  With a dish of stringless beans.
He smokes his old tobaccoless pipe,
  And laughs a mirthless laugh
When papa tries to coax her back
  By wireless telegraph.

Following "The Spendthrift" at the Columbia will be seen Wagenhals and Kemper's production of the comedy "Seven Days." The company comes here direct from New York.

Rose Stahl will bring Patricia O'Brien here next month. Patricia proved a popular personage in the production of "The Chorus Lady" when Miss Stahl appeared in the comedy at the Van Ness.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—There was an impression a week ago among certain important interests in Wall Street that the market stability would prevail and that a moderate rise in stocks would take place at the end of July and during part of August in anticipation of a fair crop outlook, easy money and a cessation of political agitation. The reverse has occurred, however, and new low prices have been registered in leading securities. The change of front by bankers in regard to the market we can only attribute to two factors—the suspension of higher freight tariffs by the government until next fall by which railways will lose a great deal of money, and which will possibly necessitate dividend reductions, and the crop situation which continues to give some little apprehension. The money situation during the crop moving period is of course another disturbing element. There is little doubt of a serious setback in industry throughout the country ere long as a result of the coming political agitation in which the tariff will be the chief subject of discussion. Hence we find sufficient provocation for liquidation in stocks by big people and it seems very certain that the market will only receive casual support. The steel statement due next Tuesday will reflect an excellent past but in the matter of new business and the future the outlook is exceedingly dubious.

Wheat—Probably the worst has already been heard regarding the spring wheat crop of north America. Rains last week checked the backward tendency that was universally conceded for the spring wheat crop in a good part of the northwest on both side of the international line. The harvest is now getting rapidly under way this side of the line, and it may soon be followed by revision of market values in that section; meanwhile the trade is waiting for the first big run of new winter wheat. It is starting a little later than last year, but promises to be considerable for a time at least. Upon the extent and continuance of this run very largely depends the course of the market for the year. If arrivals are large enough to pile up a surplus at centers of accumulation it may mean a hard fight for the believers in higher prices. If the run is small or of short duration the bears are likely to go into retirement again. There are problems ahead of the present crop that have never before been considered. There is no foreign outlet, while the domestic trade is only just recovering from the effects of reckless overloading. The crop, if statistics are of value. appears to be adjusted to about normal home needs, with a modest margin for export.

Corn—Corn values experienced a sharp upward turn during mid-week, followed by an almost equally sharp setback the following day. Speculative congestion due to the existence of several large concentrated holdings gave shrewd local speculators an opportunity to hoist prices and forced shorts to cover at the advance.

Cotton—Local rains have occurred during the past week in the Upper Mississippi and Missouri valleys with heavy rains in Alabama. High temperatures of 100 to 103 maximum occurred in Texas and Oklahoma where fair weather prevailed. Speculation and investment in the new crops is broadening. Friday will be the first notice day for August contracts and the following Tuesday the government report will be issued. Meantime the usual private forecasts will be made public and it is probable that an effort will be made to discount the bullishness of the report. We feel especially friendly to the market and would advise buying the entire list from August forward.

Copper—The strength of the copper issues, notably Amalgamated, Anaconda and Utah, is accompanied by a number of rumors, among them one to the effect that the large interests have agreed upon some sort of a plan looking to curtailment in output. The statement is also made that a block of between thirty and forty thousand shares of Utah recently changed hands and that Anaconda interests may obtain representation on the Utah board. It is interesting to note that virtually all the leading copper producers favor curtailment in output and on account of this it is held that negotiations with this end in view should meet with few obstacles.

What the Waiter Says

The waiter who bawls out his order to the cook in the kitchen may soon be as extinct as the dodo; but his cries should live forever.

"Mutton broth in a hurry," says a customer. "Baa-baa in the rain! Make him run!" shouts the waiter.

Beefsteak and onions," says a customer. "John Bull! Make him a ginny!" shouts the waiter.

"Where's my baked potato?" asks a customer. "Mrs. Murphy in a sealskin coat!" shouts the waiter.

"Two fried eggs. Don't fry 'em too hard," says a customer. "Adam and Eve in the Garden! Leave their eyes open!" shouts the waiter.

"Poached eggs on toast," says a customer. "Bride and groom on a raft in the middle of the ocean!" shouts the waiter.

"Chicken croquettes," says a customer. "Fowl Balls!" shouts the waiter.

"Hash," says a customer. "Gentleman wants to take a chance!" shouts the waiter.

"I'll have hash, too," says the next customer. "Another sport!" shouts the waiter.

"Glass of milk," says a customer. "Let it rain!" shouts the waiter.

"Frankfurters and sauerkraut, good and hot," says a customer. "Fido, Shep and a bale of hay!" shouts the waiter; "and let 'em sizzle!"

The advances made in the construction of leather treads for automobile tires is exciting great interest in motor car circles. Additional importance is attached to the industry by the soaring price of rubber which very strongly emphasizes the comparative economy in the use of leather. During this season unusually satisfying strides have been taken in leather tread methods and they are coming into very extensive use in the East. Among the prominent firms manufacturing them is the Leather Tire Goods of Niagara Falls, N. Y. The Chanslor & Lyon Motor Supply Co. handle their output in this locality.

The Other Woman

"And you let her go? Are you not jealous?"

"Why, that was her object."

"Do you mean to imply that her purpose was defeated?"

"The necessary presumptions are lacking. Somehow, there seems to be no proper line of demarcation here between monde and demi-monde."

"As if jealousy were dependent upon that distinction!"

The writer shrugged his shoulders. "It is for me, very decidedly." They continued to stroll up and down the terrace, blowing the smoke clouds of their cigarettes into the warm Southern spring evening and skimming the surface only in light, superficial conversation. After a while, he separated from his friend.

"Are you not going to stay up here for the rest of the evening? It is already eleven o'clock. You surely are not thinking of going down to the Casino at this time of night?"

"That is exactly what I am going to do."

"Well—well! Perhaps it is the lady after all who has cause for jealousy!"

"Maybe that is my little game."

"All right. I am going to tell her about you," cried the friend after him.

When he reached the station, the crowded cars were just rolling in. The lady emerged in person, for she had not been to the opera after all, but had gone shopping instead with an acquaintance, who knew all about Nice. She had acquired a treasure trove of silk and laces and fripperies.

"And then I got me a frock, a Paris model—simply a dream!" she said beamingly, just as excited over the fact as a girl in her 'teens. "It fits like a glove! Why, the manager said to me: Madame, you are a true Parisian! I shall have it by tomorrow afternoon. Then I shall wear it for dinner in the evening. By the by, were you going to the Casino at this time of night?"

"Yes, that was my intention."

She playfully threatened him. "I would never have forgiven you. This very evening, I had meant to put your devotion to the test."

"Indeed!"

"Now you must turn back with me at once, do you hear?"

"But then you must promise to have a glass of champagne with me on the terrace."

"Impossible. I am ready to drop. Imagine how I have trudged for hours, from one department store to the other, in the Nice sunshine! But I will promise for tomorrow. Only you will have to be very, very nice indeed!"

"I thought I was always nice."

"By no means. There is room for improvement!"

She laughted and coquettishly dropped her head a little to one side. "Moreover, tomorrow is my birthday."

"And you did not tell me before? Of course, we will have to celebrate."

"I really did not mean to celebrate at all. Standing all alone as I do—and having passed through so many experiences—but then I always tell myself Youth is so short and so fleeting," she remarked, with somewhat affected sentimentality.

She took his proffered arm and turned at his side into the path leading to the hotel. The terrace was illuminated in fairy-like splendor. Dark figures in dress suits appeared like shadows at the side of daintily gowned and diamond-bedecked women. The Gypsy music, the tinkling laughter, the fragrance of flowers, and the rustle of silk blended into a festive, intoxicating essence of pleasure in the semi-tropical, sultry, starlit night.

Under the seal of secrecy, the entire circle of acquaintances had been informed about the impending birthday. The breakfast table was accordingly loaded with flowers. The young author likewise had ordered a beautiful floral offering. She distinguished him by placing some of his flowers in her belt. But somehow it did not please him, because the flowers she had chosen were white roses, exactly the flowers least suited to her personality. He was irritated at his own thoughts. For whom then were white roses more suitable? Too bad that he could not break himself of this newly acquired sentimentality!

On this morning, he forced himself into the most exaggerated high spirits. He played all sorts of pranks, while the merry crowd who had gathered to celebrate the lady's twenty-sixth birthday (do not let us be too accurate!) was speeding along the Corniche in a large automobile. The snow white monster rolled along the magnificent road, trailing a long cloud of dust behind it. The ladies, all armed with goggles and leather caps, frequently shrieked aloud at the frantic speed with which they were whirled down the declivities and around the sharp corners. The writer's reckless mood was well met by this rushing, breathless flight, in which the chauffeur delighted to display his skill.

Towards the end of the sumptuous luncheon, which was served in the Restaurant de la Reserve at the Gulf promenade of Cannes, he brought out a sparkling toast to the health of the birthday queen, as he raised the champagne goblet.

Everybody cheered and applauded, surrounding the lady, whose mood was rosily tinged with champagne, as was that of the majority of the participants. Her hands were taken possession of and covered with kisses. All at once, one of the gentlemen, who had lived for a long time in Paris, protested against this kissing of hands, claiming that a salute was the only proper and time-hallowed procedure on a festive occasion of this kind. She was obliged to submit. Everyone was privileged to salute her, according to the French example set by the ringleader, who imprinted a fleeting kiss on the powdered cheek, first to the left and then to the right of the mouth. When the writer's turn came, she pressed her lips for an instant close to his.

While coffee and liqueurs were being served, together with cigarettes, in the pavilion built out over the water, she entertained him again by raving about her new frock, the birthday surprise she had prepared for herself.

"By the time we get back, the box will have arrived. I can hardly wait to see it. You will be able to judge for yourself tonight."

"So I am not to see the masterpiece before that time?"

She deliberated. Blowing away a tiny cloud of fragrant smoke, and peeping rapidly to right and left, she said in a semi-whisper: "I shall be dressed by six o'clock, in time for my cup of tea. But do not come across the corridor, please, in order to avoid all gossip. It will be best for you to sit on the balcony of the reading room. My suite is next door to it. Well, we shall see."

The others were consumed with envy as they witnessed the excellent terms the couple seemed to be on. Th universal mood, however, rose to more exuberant heights than ever on the way home.

When they separated on the hotel terrace in Upper Monte Carlo, the writer reminded the lady of her promise. But now she objected.

Her bejeweled hand happened to rest on the back of a chair. He felt impelled to place his own hand over it. She let him do so, trembling slightly under the pressure of his fingers, which had grown all at once as cold as ice. Then she returned the pressure of his hand, gently, almost imperceptibly. He had caught fire, as he was free to admit to himself. If there was a flaw in his triumph, it lay in the fact that his victory had been made too easy.

"I am going to promenade up and down right here, in front of the reading room, like a very good boy, between your room and mine," he said with a smile. "You will come at least as far as the door, in order to show yourself to me in the new dress—won't you?"

She nodded without speaking. Then she suddenly wheeled around and disappeared in the door of her apartment. He knew that she was expecting him.

The sun was just about to set. The western sky was flaming in fiery reds. The colors were so intense that all the windows and balconies gradually filled with spectators.

The young man likewise was charmed for a time by this wonderful play of colors. Cape Martin slowly dwindled to a pale, pinkish streak, gradually turning to lavender. A sea of light tints spread from the direction of Marseilles beyond the outposts of the Maritime Alps and gradually across the entire horizon. A dark red haze lay in front of the west—a while sail came gliding past and was at once dipped in crimson. On the water, the last beams of the setting sun were mirrored in millions of new chromatic tints and transitions. Wherever the keel of sailing vessels furrowed the dark waters of the Gulf, sending the billows again and again to both sides in broadly sweeping curves, the white foam was flecked with a delicate pink. The darker flame color floated in a golden shimmer, constantly changing, over the steel blue surface. This was not water, no, it was a sea of opal and gold. From the small crests of foam, silver sparks sprayed up into the darkening air.

The ahs! and ohs! of admiration around him had subsided. He now stood alone upon the terrace; filled with a longing mixed with infinite sadness. Not a leaf stirred in the palms and orange trees in the park below. Deep peace was brooding over his bit of paradise.

His contemplative mood was interrupted by the porter who obsequiously brought his mail, a number of much traveled letters demanding extra postage. But there was one which bore the correct address and which he almost tore across in his haste to learn its message. He did not even take the time to step into his room, but began to read at once, although it had already become rather dark on the terrace. Just as he reached the last words, the electric lights flared up, lending to the structure from afar the appearance of a fairy palace. He still stood there reading. Everything had disappeared around him. But the beautiful sad eyes of the other woman were gazing at him from the darkness. It was as if her eyes could reach from the blue distance to the Mediterrancan Gulf, and as if they were penetrating to the very depths of his soul.

"I have kept silence," she wrote, "because my battle had to be fought alone. Now at last I am free. Whether my voice is still strong enough to reach you in midst of the social whirl of Monte Carlo, I do not know. I hope so—but my hope is nothing but a tiny, trembling flame."

The door leading into the small reception room of the temptress was still open. The lights had not yet been lit. They had even been extinguished again in the adjoining bedroom, where she had donned the new dinner gown. It was still light enough to admire the beautiful garment. The large arc lamps, which floated like full moons in the dark blue sky above the terrace, threw a magic radiance over the cozy room and the smiling woman before the mirror.

Her slender, supple bust emerged from sea green waves of airy chiffon, which formed the material of the blouse-like waist. Rippling cascades of chiffon seemed to float like a vapor

AN UP-TO-DATE STOVE

Do you realize there is no longer any reason why you should use a coal range? Oil is cheaper than coal; it is lighter and easier to handle, and gives an intense heat. Provided you have the right stove, oil is more economical, cleaner and less trouble. Have you seen the

New Perfection
WICK BLUE FLAME
Oil Cook-stove

The accompanying illustration gives you only a rough idea of its appearance. You really can't appreciate it until you either use it yourself, or talk to someone who has used it. It does everything that a coal range will do—except heat the room. The New Perfection Oil Cook-Stove will do anything, from heating a kettle of water to cooking a course dinner, but it won't heat a room. It doesn't "smell," it doesn't smoke. It can't get out of order. Light it and it is ready. Turn it down and it is out. Only a woman who knows the trouble of carrying coal and cooking in a hot kitchen can appreciate what it means to have a clean, perfect stove that will cook anything, boil, bake or roast, and yet won't heat the kitchen. How is it done? The flame is controlled in turquoise-blue enamel chimneys, and directed against the bottom of pot, pan, kettle or oven, and only there. The flame operates exactly where it is needed —and nowhere else. With this stove your kitchen is cool.

Cautionary Note: Be sure you get this stove—see that the name-plate reads "New Perfection."

The nickel finish with the bright blue of the chimneys makes the stove ornamental and attractive. Made with 1, 2 and 3 burners; the 2 and 3-burner stoves can be had with or without Cabinet.

over the heavy, soft silk, with many interstices bridged over by Brussels lace. The closely shirred skirt at last flowed down in extravagantly wide, soft billows, the sea green chiffon suggesting the floods from which arises the seaborn Goddess of Beauty. The broad jeweled necklace lent a proud poise to her piquant head, crowned by auburn hair, in which a small diadem was scintillating. A mysterious glamor emanated also from the silk garment. Hundreds of tiny silver tinsel ornaments flashed from the chiffon waves, irregularly scattered, as if poured out in reckless profusion. The entire woman seemed to radiate in the deepening twilight.

The temptress smilingly appeared on the threshold. The terrace was empty. No—over there, at the banisters, someone seemed to recognize her. Now he turned. But he approached the open door to the left of the reading-room—his room!

She waited a while longer. It was somewhat chilly at the open door, for the nights were invariably accompanied by a marked change of temperature. A triumphant smile passed over her features. She picked up a large fur boa of costly ermine from the nearest rocker, threw it around her, and ventured out a few steps upon the terrace.

Deep silence lay all around, for the guests had all gone to their rooms, in order to dress for dinner. She heard only the rustle of her long train and of the silken skirts dragging over the marble tiles. She had passed more than once by his door, which had remained half open. She could see him moving hastily to and fro, but she did not wish to stop, because she thought he was dressing for dinner. She could hear the pulling out of bureau drawers, the pushing aside of trunks.

At last her exuberant spirits, and perhaps a little natural impatience as well, helped to drive her upon his threshold. He was bending over his trunk. When he heard the rustle of the silken skirts, he turned hastily around.

She gave a short laugh. For an instant, she spread out her arms, so that the fur, the ends of which she was lifting at the same time, left her dress exposed.

"Well?" she said, amused by his startled, not to say perturbed expression. He pushed his hair back, and looked confusedly around his room, with all the open trunks and boxes and cupboards. The gravity expressed in his features froze the smile upon her lips. She suddenly caught sight of the traveling bag upon the table.

"What is the matter? Are you getting packed?"

"I am. I am obliged to leave tonight."

"But that is—that is—more than peculiar."

"Yes. I have received news which concerns me—nay, moved me so deeply that—"

The fur had been dropped back over her seductive array.

"Indeed?" she said almost soundlessly. "News, you say. Of a business character. I presume?"

Her aspect, her insistence, hurt him.

"No," he said shortly, after a brief, mute struggle with himself. "It is only a personal matter. But it is a call which I must and will obey."

His strange and freezing accents struck her like a cold shower. She felt that she was annoying him. She could not forgive herself for remaining even another second. At the same time her rising anger rendered her incapable for the moment of ending the scene. In helpless fury, she kept clasping and unclasping the tips of her fur boa.

"That is indeed more than peculiar!" she at last repeated half to herself. Suddenly she covered her eyes with her hands, turned abruptly, and hurried away past the reading room, back to her apartment. The rustle of silk died away. Impetuous weeping, like that of a spoiled child, became faintly audible in the distance, immediately followed by the violent slamming of a door.

The man was keenly alive to the fact that he had mortally offended the pretty woman. But he had not time to ponder over the matter. She belonged to another world, so infinitely remote from the world that suddenly claimed him again as its own!

The Riviera express was to leave in an hour. He was obliged to finish his packing in a desperate hurry. By noon of the following day, he might expect to arrive at his destination.

He was to see her again—the other woman!

A manager met an actor and noticed that he was wearing a mourning band on his arm.

"It's for my father," the actor explained. "I've just come from his funeral."

The manager expressed his sympathy. The actor's grief was obviously very real and great. "I attended to all the funeral arrangements," he said. "He had everything just as father would have liked it."

"Were there many there?" asked the manager.

"Many there!" cried the actor with pride. "Why, my boy, we turned 'em away!"

Auto Notes

E. T. Huffman has just established a new record from San Francisco to Merced in his Chalmers "30." The distance is 150 miles and Mr. Huffman made it in 5 hours and 10 minutes, beating the train schedule by 50 minutes. The route taken crossed the San Joaquin Valley and thence followed the foothills. The Chalmers used has already done 8,000 miles and Mr. Huffman states that he has never had the cylinders out.

A. D. Plughoff, vice-president of the J. W. Leavitt Company, has just returned from a trip into Los Angeles and throughout the southern part of the State. While gone he made a thorough study of the auto situation and reports things generally on the boom. Plughoff went down by the valley and came back by the coast route stopping at the various Leavitt agencies.

Below is given a partial list of the California motorists who registered at Del Monte recently and the name of the car driven by each: E. Stimson, Cadillac, L. A. Mitchell, Locomobile, W. Mills, Stearns, P. E. Drescher, Locomobile, W. S. Thompson, Pierce Arrow, L. T. Yates, Peerless, John Redington, Chalmers-Detroit, T. L. Milton, Ford, S. M. Griffith, Winton Big Six, P. Forve, Packard, Mrs. Maier, Peerless, C. E. Green, Locomobile, W. W. Tillman, Pierce Arrow, M. A. Mack, Buick, L. Gerstle, Pierce Arrow, C. H. Wilhelm, Packard, N. Williams, Cadillace, H. Wright, Locomobile, C. E. Anthony, Packard, G. H. Ennis, Locomobile, Geo. Burton, Stoddard Dayton, J. V. de Laveaga, Packard and F. E. Booth, Lozier.

E. P. Brinegar, president of the Pioneer Automobile Company, is just in receipt of some interesting information concerning the new Hudson factory. Speaking of it he says: "With two hundred men at work, a mile of sewers laid, gigantic quantities of material piling up daily and the railroad laying its five sidings, the Hudson's new $500,000 factory in Detroit, Michigan, begins to assume reality. As an indication of the size of the new factory the contractors have estimated that the following amounts of material will be needed: 1,000,000 bricks, 500,000 feet of lumber, 400 tons of re-inforced steel, 5,000 square feet of glass and 100,000 sacks of cement. If placed end to end the bricks would more than stretch across the State of Michigan at its widest point; the lumber would reach over ninety-four miles, and the sacks of cement would extend nine miles."

The growing use of so-called pleasure cars for strictly commercial purposes has been a most important feature in this season's increased automobile demand. Practically every large merchantile establishment that employs traveling salesmen has furnished them with automobiles. But recently the Sherman, Clay & Company, the well known piano dealers, took delivery of two Hudson runabouts for use of their salesmen.

Mr. E. P. Brinegar of the Ways and Means Committee of the Panama Pacific Exposition has recently received an additional $2,500 subscription from the automobile industry. This comes mainly from the taxicab people. There are still several dealers and branch houses yet to be heard from. Mr. Brinegar requests that all dealers who have not yet sent in their subscriptions get them to him as soon as possible, as it is desired that the automobile dealers and allied interests place their subscriptions together. This is what is being done by other lines of business.

J. H. Shields, sales manager for the H. E. Wilcox Motor Co., builders of the Wilcox trucks, is in town spending a few days with the Pioneer Automobile Company. This is Mr. Shields' first visit to the coast since 1904 and he expresses himself as greatly impressed by the tremendous strides that have been taken here in the motor car business. Basing his conclusion on observations taken here in comparison with conditions as they exist in the East he foresees an immense field west of the Rockies for the motor truck business.

Word received by Weinstock Nichols Co. from the Flanders 20 "Under Three Flags" car states that the machine which is now in Texas has made the entire distance from Quebec without once using the pump on the Morgan & Wright tires with which the machine is equipped. The first stretch on the long trip was made in a continuous down pour of rain. The resultant mud in places was hub-deep but the car, assisted by the Nobbies, plowed through without the use of chains.

Mr. C. L. Simmons has associated himself with The Lozier Motor Company and has started on an extended trip throughout the South and West, visiting old agencies and extending the Lozier field of operation into new territory. When the general offices of the Lozier Motor Company are removed to Detroit, Mr. Simmons will make his headquarters at that point.

Hugo Muller, president of the Hugo Muller Co., has just returned from a trip to Sacramento made in a Premier car. Muller was accompanied by Frank Graham, manager of Ye Liberty Theater of Oakland. While gone they encountered a terrific wind to break which they pitched the top of their wind shield forward. The velocity of the wind was so great, however, that it blew the top back to the vertical and threatened to wreck it completely.

C. A. Hawkins, Pacific Coast manager of the White Company, reports the delivery of a "C-A" White Gasoline Car to W. A. Hildreth of Stockton.

The Diamond Motor Cycle tire has achieved great popularity in the local field. The factory has a branch that gives particular attention to this department of tire construction and their success is evidenced by the satisfaction motor cycle owners are getting. Chelini & Caster of this city declare that they have used a Diamond tire for 5,000 miles on their motor cycle, doing the major part over rough roads and the tire now looks as if it had done not more than 500 miles.

SUMMONS TO ESTABLISH TITLE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—Department No. 1, No. 22,257.

ELISABETH MILLS REID and OGDEN MILLS, Plaintiffs, vs.
All Persons Claiming any Interest in, or Lien Upon, the Real Property Herein Described or any Part Thereof, Defendants.

The People of the State of California: To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Elisabeth Mills Reid and Ogden Mills, plaintiffs, filed with the clerk of the above entitled Court and City and County, within three (3) months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

First Parcel—All that certain lot, piece or parcel of land bounded and described as follows: Commencing at the corner formed by the intersection of the northerly line of Bush Street with the easterly line of Montgomery Street; running thence easterly along said northerly line of Bush Street one hundred and thirty-seven (137) feet and six (6) inches; running thence northerly and at right angles to said northerly line of Bush Street one hundred and thirty-seven (137) feet and six (6) inches; running thence westerly and at right angles to the last mentioned course sixty-seven (67) feet and six (6) inches; running thence northerly and at right angles to the last mentioned course twenty-two (22) feet; running thence westerly and at right angles to the last mentioned course seventy (70) feet to the easterly line of Montgomery Street; and running thence southerly along said easterly line of Montgomery Street one hundred and fifty-nine (159) feet and six (6) inches to the point of commencement.

Second Parcel—All that certain lot, piece or parcel of land bounded and described as follows: Commencing at a point on the northerly line of Bush Street, distant thereon one hundred and thirty-seven (137) feet and six (6) inches easterly from the corner formed by the intersection of the northerly line of Bush Street with the easterly line of Montgomery Street; running thence easterly and along the said northerly line of Bush Street sixty-eight (68) feet and nine (9) inches; running thence at right angles northerly one hundred and thirty-seven (137) feet and six (6) inches; running thence at right angles westerly sixty-eight (68) feet and nine (9) inches; and running thence at right angles southerly one hundred and thirty-seven (137) feet and six (6) inches to the point of commencement; being a part of Fifty Vara Lot Number Two Hundred and Three (203).

Third Parcel—An undivided one-half of that certain lot, piece or parcel of land bounded and described as follows: Commencing at a point on the easterly line of Laura Place, distant thereon one hundred and twelve (112) feet and six (6) inches southerly from the southerly line of Pine Street, and which point is also eighty-seven (87) feet and six (6) inches easterly from the easterly line of Montgomery Street; running thence southerly and along said easterly line of Laura Place and parallel with the easterly line of Montgomery Street twenty-five (25) feet; running thence at a right angle easterly seventy-seven (77) feet and six (6) inches; running thence at a right angle northerly and parallel with the easterly line of Montgomery Street twenty-five (25) feet; and running thence at a right angle westerly seventy-seven (77) feet and six (6) inches to the easterly line of Laura Place and point of commencement; being part of Fifty Vara Lots Numbers Two Hundred and Two (202) and Two Hundred and Fifty-five (255); subject, however, to all the terms, conditions, covenants and agreements contained in that certain indenture made on the 11th day of December, 1906, by and between Exchange Realty Company, a corporation duly incorporated under the laws of the State of California, having its principal place of business in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and D. O. Mills and Ogden Mills and Elisabeth Mills Reid (wife of Whitelaw Reid), and recorded in the office of the County Recorder of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on the 5th day of February, 1907, in Liber 64 of Deeds, at page 10, New Series.

Fourth Parcel—An undivided one-fourth of that certain lot, piece or parcel of land bounded and described as follows: Commencing at a point one hundred and twelve (112) feet and six (6) inches southerly on a perpendicular line drawn from a point on the southerly line of Pine Street one hundred and sixty-five (165) feet easterly from the easterly line of Montgomery Street, which point of commencement is also seventy-seven (77) feet and six (6) inches easterly on a perpendicular line drawn from a point on the easterly line of Laura Place one hundred and twelve (112) feet and six (6) inches southerly from the southerly line of Pine Street; running thence southerly and parallel with Laura Place twenty-five (25) feet; running thence at a right angle easterly and parallel with Pine Street twenty-five (25) feet; running thence at a right angle northerly and parallel with Laura Place twenty-five (25) feet; and running thence at a right angle westerly twenty-five (25) feet to the point of commencement; being part of Fifty Vara Lot Number Two Hundred and Two (202); subject, however, to all the terms, conditions, covenants and agreements contained in that certain indenture made on the 11th day of December, 1906, by and between Exchange Realty Company, a corporation duly incorporated under the laws of the State of California, having its principal place of business in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and D. O. Mills and Ogden Mills and Elisabeth Mills Reid (wife of Whitelaw Reid), and recorded in the office of the County Recorder of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on the 5th day of February, 1907, in Liber 56 of Deeds, at page 371, New Series.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiffs will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that the plaintiffs are the owners of said property in fee simple absolute; that their title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consist of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiffs recover their costs herein. and have such other relief as may be meet in the premises.

Witness my hand and the seal of said Court this 16th day of July, A. D. 1910. H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.

SUMMONS (Divorce)

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 28,873, Dept. No. 10.

ELSIE FREDERICA McGLYNN, sometimes called FREDERICA McGLYNN, Plaintiff, vs.
CHARLES S. McGLYNN, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

The People of the State of California, send Greeting to Charles S. McGlynn, Defendant:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, on the ground of defendant's wilful neglect; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the Complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

Given under my hand and the Seal of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 2nd day of April, A. D. 1910. H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.

Good Books for Boys

It is a blessed thing for the stock producers of boys' books that children are so intensely conservative. Despite the theory of the professional educator that there is necessity for constant novelty and short shifts, it is precisely the reverse that is the truth. The infant in the nursery who takes a fancy to some particular jingle or lullaby tune will accept no other, and though his patient nurse or parent may be driven to distraction by the incessant demand for repetition, not so the young tyrant himself. A generation ago the youth of the land fed fat on Horatio Alger and Oliver Optic. Their volumes are still meeting with a steady sale and nine-tenths of the followers in the same field are turning out work as similar as one clothes pin is to another but it is rare indeed to hear a word of protest or complaint. The limit of variation lies between a day school and a boarding school and amongst the variety of athletic sports which occupy the attention of Young America to the exclusion of all else. The hero is either misunderstood by his preceptors or persecuted by the villain—in any case he has to be under a cloud for a while in order to shine with the greater splendor when the gloom is lifted. There is always a sneak or a bully, usually the hopeful heir of a neglectful millionaire father, and the cast may be further filled by adding an incompetent teacher and a charming miss who has an incipient love affair with the hero—not that they think of such matters, of course. Only the bad boys have such notions in their heads. Anywhere from two hundred and fifty to three hundred pages are needed for exploiting the trials and tribulations, and then comes graduation day or the joint field meeting with some rival academy or the great game of baseball or football, in which all the good boys gain honor and are vindicated while the cowards go down to defeat and those who were "on the fence," decide to cast in their lot with the successful. The recipe is as reliable for a boy's book as the directions for making pan cakes from self-rising flour. Edward Stratemeyer has added another to his long list of juveniles, taking up his "Lakeport Boys," who, having already shown what they were capable of in a gun club, a boat club and a base ball nine, have now tackled football, with their usual success. Voup and Boardman, who gave them so much annoyance in their other associations, are still active enemies. Some new boys move into the village and there are some exciting times with a forest fire, a thief hunt which ends in the capture of Dan Marcy again, and a whole series of football matches reported a length. Most of these happenings take place during the school vacation and to that extent at least, "The Football Boys of Lakeport" is less demoralizing than many of its class.

Norman Brainerd has chosen a military academy as the scene of his strenuous recital. Chatam Military School is patterned, so he tells, on the plan of West Point, though it must be confessed that the faculty do not appear to have been much more alert to what was going on about them than do the staff of boarding schools in general. The two great events at Chatham were the yearly prize drill and the election on graduation day of a second lieutenant to be chosen from one of two candidates presented by the faculty. Bob Anderson, the "hero" who had entered the academy but that year from a high school, had determined to win both honors, and Howard Frayle, the "villain" holding the rank of captain and about to be graduated, with a hearty dislike for Anderson, was determined that he should be defeated. To this end there were the usual underhanded tricks and traps and for a while Frayle, aided by his subordinate, Thorpe, succeeded in bringing Anderson into bad repute, that high minded youth, of course, preferring to suffer any kind and amount of infamy rather than clear himself and equally of course, after heated arguments with tongues and fists, virtue is rewarded and vice punished It was President Lincoln who once made the cryptic remark that "For people who like this sort of thing this is the sort of thing they like," so, the boys of twelve and under, who are still under the spell of the genus Oliver Optic will have no fault to find with either of the stories which, in their own field, are about on a level with the average best seller. Both are from the house of Lothrop, Lee and Shepard, which publishes the bulk of the American juveniles.

A Book of Lay Sermons

When one contemplates the large and increasing number of books which come under the general head of "New Thought," and the evident satisfaction which they yield to their readers, one wonders what the Higher Critics have accomplished. They have hewed and hammered and hammered and brought down great chunks of masonry, but all the time there has been just as steady an upbuilding in less conspicuous places. Our forbears read sermons printed after delivery but nowaday these lay-sermons reach as large an audience. The John Wesleys and the Calvins thundered forth their doctrines, holding themselves to be the prophets, incapable of error because they had their inspiration direct from the Godhead. They did not seek to convince their congregations, but ordered them to "believe or be damned," and it was a brave and bold sinner who dared make opposition, for if he feared not heavenly wrath he had good reason to walk cannily lest earthly retribution be meeted out to him. In these later days sermons are of the persuasive order founded on a logical train of thought and once the first principle is accepted the rest follows on its own accord. Instead of the Bible going out of fashion it is made more and more the foundation of belief. Aaron Martin Crane is one of the best known writers in this new field, his "Right and Wrong Thinking" being almost a classic. His latest volume, "A Search after Ultimate Truth," fresh from the press of Lothrop, Lee and Shepard, will meet the same success as its predecessors.

"You have been out of work for a month now, John," said the wife.

"I know it," replied the indolent husband; "but I think now I have the key to the situation."

"Well, hustle around a little and get the situation."

It was a villainous and an unholy razor that the strange barber was plying, yet Pitcher stood the scraping like a philosopher.

"Shaved many corpses in your time?" he asked.

"Since you mention it, sir, I 'ave shaved several."

"Ah! Easily pleased, ain't they?"

And some of the barber's subsequent work made Simon Legree look like a soft-hearted Samaritan.

Fogg—Ever notice what?

Figg—That there's no law to prohibit fighting in the state of matrimony.

"How rich is he?"

"Immensely wealthy. He's had every operation the doctors could think of."

THE

CHALMERS "30"

HAS BEEN DECLARED THE WINNER

OF THE

HARDEST GLIDDEN TOUR?

Bill Bolger's protest this year against the award of the trophy to the Premier has been sustained by the Contest Board of the American Automobile Association. This is but one of the many examples of the Chalmers' superiority, which has been demonstrated by a long line of victories.

Let us show you why every owner can duplicate these results.

Let us show you that the Chalmers is second to none in construction, design and finish.
